

Heidegger's People

From the State to Poetry

by

A.
James Phillips, B.A. Hons., PG Dip. Ed., M.A.

Submitted in fulfilment of the requirements for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy

University of Tasmania December, 2001

Declaration of Originality

I declare that this thesis contains no material that has previously been accepted for a degree or diploma by the University of Tasmania or any other institution. To the best of my knowledge and belief, this thesis contains no material written or previously published by another person except where due acknowledgement is made in the text of the thesis.

A handwritten signature in cursive script that reads "James Phillips".

James Phillips

Statement of authority of access

This thesis may be made available for loan and limited copying in accordance with the Copyright Act 1968.

A handwritten signature in cursive script that reads "James Phillips".

James Phillips

Acknowledgements

In the course of writing this dissertation I was fortunate enough to receive the assistance of several individuals and institutions. I am grateful to the Austrian Exchange Service for the chance to use the resources of Innsbruck University and the Brenner Archive. To the German Academic Exchange Service I also owe a debt of gratitude for providing me with the possibility of furthering my research at Potsdam University. It was at Monash University, under the direction of Prof. Alexander García Düttmann, that I found my way to my topic, which I was then able to develop at the University of Queensland, and bring to a close at the University of Tasmania under the direction of Prof. J. E. Malpas.

Abstract

This dissertation is an attempt to expound Heidegger's conception of Volk. Its thesis is that there is but the one conception of Volk behind both Heidegger's engagement and disengagement with National Socialism. In §74 of Being and Time, Heidegger introduces the word "Volk" in a discussion of the essential historicity of Dasein — the Volk, which is not to be understood as an aggregate of subjects, takes its definition (as much as Dasein itself) from the being-outside-of-itself of ecstatic temporality. Given this definition of the Volk, Heidegger must arguably have welcomed in the "folkish" self-assertion of 1933 the assertion of Being's irreducibility to the static temporality of the present-at-hand. After his withdrawal from university politics in 1934, Heidegger criticised the regime but he did not criticise his own error. The philosophical grounds for this stance towards error can be discerned in his defence of being-outside-of-itself in his confrontation with Hegel (chapter I). With its discussion of the failure of knowledge, the rectoral address is an exhortation of the Volk to the error of its own essence as Dasein (chapter II). Heidegger's subsequent lectures on art develop the anti-modernist conception of the German people in the context of a re-appraisal of the ecstatic character of mimesis (chapter III). Heidegger's notion of a non-positive, and hence non-imperialistic, Heimat informs his readings of Kant and Hölderlin (chapter IV). And in the 1952 essay on Trakl, "Geschlecht" carries the being-outside-of-itself of "Volk" to a contamination with the animal (chapter V).

Table of Contents

| | |
|-------------------------------------|-----|
| Introduction | 6 |
| I The Death of Hegel | 76 |
| II Ontological Opportunism | 135 |
| III The Feast | 186 |
| IV Towards the Uncanny Homeland | 240 |
| V The Geschlecht of the Poem | 307 |
| Conclusion | 346 |
| Notes | 349 |
| Bibliography | 368 |

Introduction

Heidegger's engagement with National Socialism was a philosophical engagement. It was a philosophical engagement even as it appeared, and more than appeared, an abdication of philosophy. Mistaking the philosophical character peculiar to this engagement, Wolfgang Schädewaldt famously accosted Heidegger on a tram after his early resignation of the rectorship of Freiburg University with the question, "Back from Syracuse?" Unlike Plato, Heidegger had not sought out the political realm as the open space for the implementation of a preconceived philosophy of the ideal state. What Heidegger desired in 1933, and what he imagined he could effect through running the university in collaboration with the new regime, was, on the contrary, the irruption of the non-ideality of the political realm into philosophy. He confessed as much to Karl Löwith in Rome in 1936, explicitly identifying his concept of historicity as the basis for his engagement.¹ The political realm in its essential historicity was itself to philosophise under National Socialism. It was itself to philosophise without diverging from its anti-philosophical character as the realm of the contingent and the finite. Philosophy was to be stood on its head. Heidegger's politics are incomprehensible and irrecoverable as an act of expansion on the part of a metaphysics of eternity, since it is above all in his critique of just such a metaphysics and of the timeless, abstract presence of the Platonic Idea and its avatars that an early susceptibility to a "folkish" politics can be discerned.

Arguably, for Heidegger, the year 1933 promised that overturning of the foundation of philosophy on whose necessity for the question of Being he expatiates in Being and Time. The subject, on which liberalism and modern metaphysics had been raised, was to give way to the people. As the subject, in truly giving way, can but carry with itself the presence that is its own foundation, National Socialism was to offer the concrete possibility of a fundamental ontology. The regime extolled a return to the rootedness in the Volk and in Heidegger's ears this was taken to announce the repudiation of that abstraction from historicity in which the subject comes to itself in its autonomy and self-presence. Heidegger does not formulate the choice at issue here as a choice between autonomy and heteronomy, but rather as a choice between alleged autonomy and the historicity in which Being is understood as other than present. Inasmuch as it comes to itself and is thus present to itself, the subject fixes on Being only in its presence and thereby cannot think the originary Being of the time in which presence is able to be presence. With respect to an understanding of Being, the subject is constricted by its liberalism. That Heidegger was politically reactionary is generally accepted as evident from the anti-liberalism of his engagement with National Socialism. That his notion of historicity, which he himself admitted to be the basis for his engagement, is consequently reactionary is the thesis that is to be disputed here.² What has to be ascertained and not assumed are the relations between historicity and nationalism and between the historicity of a people and the people of historicity. This is to ask after that which was to be conserved in Heidegger's conservatism and uncovered in his destruction of the metaphysics of presence.

In her article "Heidegger's Concept of Volk", Sonya Sikka expresses the conviction that Heidegger did not thoroughly renounce his thinking on the issue of Volk after the military defeat of National Socialism:

Heidegger never came to believe that the "essence" of this movement consisted in brutality and genocidal totalitarianism, and always felt, instead, that "the Nazis" were the Unwesen of National Socialism. As a result, "National Socialism," for Heidegger, never really happened. It fell prey to the everpresent danger of perversion, of being pushed out of its essence. It therefore did not bring forth its positive possibilities, and this means, within the framework of Heidegger's thought (which, lacking any fact/value distinction, is actually deeply "essentialist" in a way that is too often overlooked), that it never came to presence at all, or at least not "authentically."³

The "essence" of the movement — the Volk — will have been left untouched by the atrocities of the regime. But as her charge of "essentialism" shows, Sikka interprets the discussions of the Volk in Heidegger's writings too metaphysically. Attributing to Heidegger a Leibnizian conception of the people as a self-unfolding organic unity⁴, Sikka denies to historicity its primacy. The being-outside-of-itself of temporality becomes simply the stage of the people's self-unfolding from which the unity itself of the people remains Platonically aloof. Sikka misses the radical innovation of Heidegger's defining the people itself as a being-outside-of-itself. The essential corruptness of Heidegger's Volk — and its correspondingly complicated relation to the Nazi doctrine of the purity of blood — is not permitted to become a question.

If Heidegger joined the NSDAP without any prior dealings with the movement or for that matter with any political movement whatsoever, the step can nevertheless not be said to have been entirely unforeseeable. There was a shared privileging of historicity that, to begin with, concealed the divergence in the understanding of historicity. Heidegger's initial responsiveness to the Hitlerian demagogy was at once naïve and calculated, because what Heidegger chose to hear in it was the long anticipated resolution of the impasse of Cartesian subjectivity. Within the anti-liberal and "folkish" pronouncements of the new regime he was prepared to hear an echo of his own philosophical demotion of the subject in favour of historicity. The self-assertion of the German people from under the imported and frail liberalism of the Weimar Republic took on the appearance of the possibility of a disclosure of the ontological foundations of the ‘cogito sum’ and of its certainty in self-presence. What Descartes, in the inauguration of the metaphysics of subjectivity, leaves unthought, and yet nevertheless presupposes in abstracting from it, is what Heidegger discusses in Being and Time under the name of “world”. It is the existential, historical thickness of world that is flattened to the monotony of the Cartesian res extensa and that must first be flattened in just this way if the a-historical and peopleless subject is to be able to reassure itself of its own ontological transparency. In a space that can pass for the substratum of every object because it is always and everywhere only ever present, the subject does not encounter any challenge to its understanding of Being as presence. 1933 was to repoliticise the space of metaphysics by reversing its suppression of historical world. However enthusiastically Heidegger declared his allegiance to the new regime, he was always cautious to interpret the Volk on parade in the streets as no more than the promise of a reversal of the suppression of historicity. Out of opposition to the flattening of the world of the people in the Cartesian foundations of liberalism, Heidegger aligned himself with National Socialism. Even beyond his disillusionment with the regime, his thinking undertook to grasp the historical thickness of the world of the German people. The “chauvinism” of the Volk was to be thought through to its essence. For Heidegger, this was a question of an understanding of historicity rather than eugenics. The conservatism of the regime had markedly less to do with the contestation of presence through an attention to historicity than with the preservation of breeding lines in the a-historical manipulation of genetic material. In its abstraction from historicity the regime amounted only to a variation on liberalism. Increasingly, for Heidegger after 1934 the singularity of the German people on which National Socialism insists is precisely that which contests the covert liberalism of the regime. The grounds for Heidegger’s engagement with National Socialism are the grounds for his disengagement: the people of the question of Being are, in the end, too political for the metaphysics that is Nazism.

Heidegger's disillusionment with National Socialism is not a disillusionment with the notion of the Volk. What is the sense of Volk for Heidegger? And why should it be thought in conjunction with historicity and fundamental ontology? It is clear from the text "Ansprache am 11. November in Leipzig" that Heidegger in 1933 interpreted the self-assertion of the German people under National Socialism as a precondition of the knowledge of the Being of beings. The address in question, first published in the volume Bekenntnis der deutschen Universitäten und Hochschulen zu Adolf Hitler und dem nationalsozialistischen Staat, offers the coup d'état an ontological vindication:

We have renounced the idolatry of a rootless and impotent thinking. We behold the end of its servile philosophy. We are convinced that the luminous rigour and the befitting confidence of the inexorable and simple questioning concerning the essence of Being are returning. The originary courage either to grow or to shatter thereon in the confrontation with that which is constitutes the innermost impetus of the questioning of a folkish science.⁵

The idolatry of a rootless and impotent thinking has been replaced with the questioning of a "folkish" science. Following this account, what distinguishes a "folkish" science (völkische Wissenschaft) is its rootedness. Heidegger does not say that a "folkish" science is rooted in a Volk. Instead he says that a "folkish" science places itself in danger in its confrontation with that which is. The two expressions are not synonymous. In his declaration of loyalty to the new regime, Heidegger adopts the National Socialist term "völkische Wissenschaft" and refers thereby, not to a science that with its rootedness in a people has grown certain of its stability, but rather to a science that has become all the more vulnerable. Situating the rootedness of a “folkish” science in its originary courage either to grow or to shatter on the question of Being, Heidegger does not make of the “folkishness” of a “folkish” science an orienting frame of reference, a paradigm or Weltanschauung. The “folkishness” of a “folkish” science puts itself and the science as a whole in question, since for Heidegger the rootedness of a “folkish” science is the originarity that is conferred upon it in its questioning concerning the originarity understood throughout his writings as Being. Heidegger does not oppose to a rootedness in the Volk a rootedness in the question of Being because implicit in Heidegger’s address is a definition of the Volk that proceeds by reference to the question of Being. Heidegger ascribes the brittleness of a “folkish” science to its questioning concerning the essence of Being, rather than to its deficiencies according to the criteria of modern science. The rootedness of a “folkish” science is not a supplement appended to the notion of modern science whereby it is rendered more robust. It is the fragility intolerable to modern science whereby the latter would open itself (precisely in and by means of its inability to begin by constitutively flattening the existential, historical thickness of world) to that which it could not otherwise think. This rootedness is the obscurantism with relation to the universality of correct claims in which the more pernicious obscurantism of modern science in its relation to Being might itself be surmounted. Here the question of Being becomes the matter of knowledge and the guarantor of a “folkish” science in the face of its cosmopolitan simulacra. And it is in the questionableness of Being that Heidegger’s exposition of “folkish” science differs from the racist doctrine of science advocated, for example, by Heidegger’s Marburg colleague Erich Jaensch.⁶

Having tied his notion of “folkish” science to Being rather than to the a-historical presence in which the race knows itself as race, Heidegger is not guilty of Jaensch’s inconsistency in challenging the hegemony of a science whose exactitude and universality rest on a suppression of the organic and the human while, nonetheless, desiring the unimpugnable, and thus universally recognisable, distinctness of the people that is racism's dream and clandestine cosmopolitanism. For Heidegger, the world of a people does not possess the atomistic quality that Jaensch attributes to it and by which he is bound to retain the cosmopolitan as the negative universal informing these distinct worlds. If "folkish" science is the science of Being as such, it is because it seeks, rather than the derivative correctness of a rootless thinking, the Being of the world that must be known — not ontically as race, values and character, but ontologically — if anything appearing against the background of world is to be known in its presence as well as in the abyssal foundations of its presence. The liberal conception of science, which bases its claim to scientific status on the darkness in which it remains with regard to its own rootedness, is never equal to the task of thinking Being in its worldliness. It is this worldliness of Being that favours the rooted thinking of a "folkish" science and whose appearance Heidegger wills to announce itself in the self-assertion of the national. The people of Heidegger's "folkish" science is to appear without becoming present.

Since Heidegger himself in the Leipzig address declares his allegiance to both Hitler and to the question of Being, the prehistory of his political engagement is but sketchily reconstructed by commentaries that fasten on the lone instance of the word "Volk" in §74 of Being and Time. It is within the question of Being that Heidegger addresses the notion of Volk in 1927 just as it is within the question of Being that he confesses his loyalty to Hitler in 1933. To clarify the sense of "Volk" in Being and Time by its sense in National Socialism is hence reductionist and of dubious worth polemically. An interpretation of the use of "Volk" in Being and Time that does not simultaneously consider the question of Being is, irrespective of its intention, even apologetic because it isolates a suspect lexical element in Heidegger's thinking as a whole and delivers it up on its own to judgement. The step from "Volk" to Hitler is certainly one that Heidegger took, but schematised in this way Heidegger's engagement ceases to be a scandal for philosophy because the distance between his thinking and the intellectual squalor of the regime has been minimised. The question of the relation between nationalism and fundamental ontology is thereby settled without having first been examined.

Heidegger's nationalism is the nationalism of the rootedness of the Volk. It is not, however, an insurrection of the particular against the universal, if only because such an insurrection is always doomed to failure. Heidegger should not be seen to be translating Kierkegaard's anti-Hegelian individualism for the NSDAP. A Volk that insists on its singularity, on its condition as "this" Volk, is in the end, as Hegel had shown in his analysis of sense-certainty, always betrayed to the universal, by its very "thisness", by the abstractness of singularity as such. A reprise of the nominalist cult of the particular does not describe Heidegger's reaction to Hegel's panlogism, since his critique of the universal pursues another course than the beautiful soul's pathos-laden avowals of the particular's independence. Heidegger's rejection of cosmopolitanism and his engagement with a nationalistic political movement are grounded in his treatment of the universal within the question of Being. A demonstration of this can at least be attempted through a consideration, within the context of its critique of traditional ontology, of the following excerpt from the Introduction to Being and Time:

Being, as the basic theme of philosophy, is no class or genus of entities; yet it pertains to every entity. Its 'universality' is to be sought higher up. Being and the structure of Being lie beyond every entity and every possible character which an entity may possess. Being is the transcendens pure and simple. And the transcendence of Dasein's Being is distinctive in that it implies the possibility and the necessity of the most radical individuation.⁷

Being is to be sought higher up than any class or genus because its “universality” places it beyond them. It transcends them because it is nothing else than transcendence. “Being is the transcendens pure and simple.” In a marginal note to the Hüttenexemplar Heidegger clarifies this statement: “transcendens to be sure not — despite every metaphysical echo — scholastic and graeco-platonic χολιων, but rather transcendence as the ecstatic — as temporality.”⁸ Being is to be sought higher up as that which transcends class and genus. For Heidegger, Being is that which transcends purely and simply, because it is time in its overreaching of the discrete “now” of Zeno’s paradoxes. Being nowhere comes to rest in identity with itself and can therefore scarcely be inferred from the categories as their “principle” and law. Only if Being is grasped as the presence of beings, as the honesty, so to speak, with which beings give themselves up as they are to the categories (e.g. as so much and neither more nor less, as in such and such a place and not elsewhere), does Being stand in a relation to the categories that leaves the latter intact. The questionability of Being as presence, and not the independence of the particular, is what Heidegger brings up against traditional logic.

While Aristotle also denies that Being is a genus, it is nonetheless by means of a completely different argument. In Book B of the Metaphysics neither Being nor the One is admitted as the genus of what is, since the differences of each genus have to be just as each difference has to be one.⁹ Being and the One are both said in many ways. But the multiplicity by which Being distinguishes itself from a genus does not contest the legitimacy of the notion of genus. Being, for Aristotle, is to be sought higher up than any genus yet it is not to be sought higher up than the One, since Being is not said in a way that would not also be one. Aristotle does not include among the many ways of Being a way in which Being is not one: the multiplicity of Being remains effectively under the sway of the understanding of Being as ουσιον, as the substance that is the propriety and decidability of the genera. The Being of the differences that are always one is not Being as such in its transcendence and impropriety but rather Being reduced to the substantiality of presence and thereby to the propriety that it can share with the One. The difference that is, but is not one, is the unrecognised and unrecognisable difference of transcendence from the One. It is a difference that cannot be collected into its own oneness without ceasing to be transcendence. Such a difference, because it does not give itself up to be known in any unity, is unintelligible for Aristotle. The basis for intelligibility lies paradoxically in a blindness to the originary transcendence of time.

That even the One is transcended by Being, by the Being of the time that exceeds and encompasses the presence in which the One is unequivocally one, is no more acknowledged by later thinkers. When Kant, in his refutation of the ontological argument for the existence (“Dasein”) of God and within the understanding of logic laid down by Aristotle, says that existence is not a real predicate¹⁰, this distinction reformulates Being’s difference from a genus but still in terms of a complementarity instead of an antagonism. For Kant, existence is not a real predicate whereby the possibility or actuality of a thing could be distinguished within the concept itself, but the bare positing of a thing.¹¹ Kant’s polemic against an aspect of medieval theology is the occasion for an exposition of Being within a theory of representation. Earlier in the Critique of Pure Reason Kant humbles the understanding in its claim to totality and sets bounds on the use of its concepts through an account of the non-conceptuality of the a priori intuitions. Kant grounds the a priori intuitions in human finitude and thus assigns to existence an essential role in the determination of knowledge. Yet that which is thereby shown to be irreducible to the concept is less an impetus for the question of Being than the surety of representation and the propriety of the concepts of the understanding. In the Critique Kant thus devises a defence of the concepts of the understanding from their limitations regarding existence:

By whatever and by however many predicates we may think a thing — even if we completely determine it — we do not make the least addition to the thing when we further declare that this thing is. Otherwise, it would not be exactly the same thing that exists, but something more than we had thought in the concept; and we could not, therefore, say that the exact object of my concept exists.¹²

The Kantian concept relinquishes existence as a real predicate and resigns itself to representing its object. By this modesty it acquires something exterior to it and in the correspondence to this object the concept lays claim to its truth. For the sake of the traditional understanding of truth as adequation, the thought of existence is to be kept simple, since, with the split between the existence that can be added to the concept of an object and the existence itself of the object, the concept ceases to be purely representative of its object: its pretended incorporation of existence is its rejection of truth. Like Aristotle's Being, Kant's "Dasein" threatens the oneness of neither that which is to be subsumed nor that under which it is to be subsumed. In existence as the bare positing in the presence of the light of truth the Aristotelian parity of Being with the One does not become questionable.

Through holding apart the "What it is" of a being from its "That it is", Kant wanted to place a check solely on the conceptual enthusiasm of theology, whereas Kierkegaard, in response to Hegel's sublation of the distinction, set out to interpret the extra-logical character of existence as an antagonism towards logic. But with Kierkegaard the reformulation of the question of Being is stillborn, since the antagonism of existence towards traditional logic is not substantiated in an account of temporality and the differentiability of Being but left to the inadequate resources of an obstinate nominalism: “Existence is always the particular; the abstract does not exist.”¹³

Kierkegaard’s nominalism, which is dictated by his attention to the Christian doctrine of the incommensurability of the human soul, is of less importance for Heidegger than what inspired it. By neglecting the philosophy of nature, Kierkegaard gave vent to his polemics against traditional logic entirely within the question of what it is to be human. The human existence that, in Kierkegaard, eludes the universal on account of its particularity becomes the human existence (Dasein) that, in Heidegger, eludes the universal on account of its finitude. As a result, Kierkegaard’s confrontation with logic is renewed on a more originary ground. That which in the particular differentiates it from its universal — and differentiates it because in its transitoriness and perishability it is just as much not present in an identity with the universal — is traced back explicitly to the finitude that Plato subordinated to the Ideas in the founding of metaphysics. Existence is to be understood by reference to another temporality than that in which the Ideas stand fast in the eternity of their presence. And it is to be understood as human because, for Heidegger, it is human beings alone that in their projects and in the determinative exposure to the truth of their outstanding deaths resist any description that would reduce them to what can be apprehended in presence. The human being, less as a particular than as the Being of ecstatic temporality, is the basis for a polemic against traditional logic.

And yet in the excerpt from the Introduction to Being and Time Heidegger writes: “And the transcendence of Dasein’s Being is distinctive in that it implies the possibility and the necessity of the most radical individuation”. Is individuation here to be comprehended as a reprise of Kierkegaard’s individualism and in opposition to the Volk of §74? To answer tentatively, indicating the line that is to be followed: No. Inasmuch as it is transcendence that is said to imply the most radical individuation, individuation cannot here be identified with the isolation and distinction of a being from other beings.

Heidegger attributes to transcendence a more radical individuation than the isolation and distinction of a being from other beings — the latter individuation is constrained in how much it can differentiate the individual from the universal by the understanding of Being as presence that it has in common with the universal. Dasein all the more individuates itself the less it holds itself aloof from the existential, historical thickness of world. It individuates itself by the corruption through which it eludes being apprehended in presence. The peculiar distinctness of the human being, which necessitates a reassessment of the theorization of temporality in order to do justice to the anticipation of death and projects' implication of the future in the present, is obscured in the individual abstracted from the world in which alone he or she can exist. But does excluding the individual suffice to bring us to the Volk? Even if the transcendence of ecstatic temporality is overlooked in both the abstract individual and the universal of a-historical humanity, is the Volk alone what remains after the exclusion?

Between the individual and humanity as a whole there are other social formations besides the Volk. Yet Heidegger's conservatism expresses itself in an allegiance neither to the particularist interests of classes nor to the sentimentalist intimacy of the family. Heidegger's political engagement, which in the address in Leipzig as well as in other texts he ties to fundamental ontology, is an engagement with that which affords the chance of overcoming the metaphysics of presence. If Heidegger chooses the people — and not just any people but the German Volk — it is because, in the Volk, temporality as such becomes a question. This is not to deny that other peoples have histories or that classes and families can be chronicled from their emergence to their disappearance. The German Volk is the agent of the question of the relations between Being and time, not because it is the people whose history is richest in incident, but rather because it is the people that, through wanting to distinguish itself as much as possible from the self-evidence and positivism of the nation-states of its neighbours, long defined itself by its absence. Whether such a characterisation of the essence of the Volk is but the hypostasis of its political backwardness is a question that seemingly does not arise for Heidegger. It is overruled by the question of Being. Heidegger's nationalism will be a nationalism of the assertion of the absence of the Volk that knows itself to be absent. In contrast to the classes that have either already come to power or whose dialectical lot it is to realise itself as the universal class of the future, and in contrast to the family whose mythic immediacy hardly accommodates an interrogation of the understanding of Being as presence, the German Volk is an embarrassment for traditional ontology. It does not take its definition from its recognisability in the light of presence. Such an explanation of Heidegger's nationalism, offered here in advance of a commentary on Heidegger's various texts on the Volk, answers one question only to raise another. How is it that Heidegger of all thinkers could have aligned himself with a "folkish" movement that set itself the task of eliminating undecidability from the phenomenon of the Volk? Perhaps, as Heidegger wrote in his defence in December 1945, he believed that the movement could be led spiritually down other paths.¹⁴ He misinterpreted the prevailing involvement with the notion of the Volk as the possibility that the movement could be directed away from a pseudo-scientific elaboration and concreteness towards an attempt to grasp that absence of the Volk which is its essential humanity. The people of the "folkish" uprising of 1933 will turn out to have been, not the people of the recovery of the world flattened by Descartes to the presence of res extensa, but rather a humanity indistinguishable from a thing.

Undoubtedly this was to be foreseen. Heidegger did not succeed in preventing it. He did not succeed in making Being and Time the bible of National Socialism. Far more clearly than his post-war critics, the ideologues of the movement were able to recognise that Heidegger, lexical convergences aside, had not written a book in their spirit. The Volk that in 1933 inquires into the essence of Being is less the electorate of the former Weimar Republic than the Dasein of the text of 1927. The Dasein of Being and Time has not passed from the singular to the plural, since its definition in the 1927 text as Being-in-the-world precludes any differentiation of Dasein and Volk on the basis of traditional grammar. Dasein was already the transcendence of the Dasein of the Volk.

In §74 of Being and Time, in a passage invariably scrutinised by his political commentators, Heidegger broaches the question of the people, distinguishing the Volk from a levelling aggregation of subjects:

But if fateful Dasein, as Being-in-the-world, exists essentially in Being-with-Others, its historizing is a co-historizing and is determinative for it as destiny [Geschick]. This is how we designate the historizing of the community, of the people. Destiny is not something that puts itself together out of individual fates, any more than Being-with-one-another can be conceived as the occurring together of several Subjects.¹⁵

It is destiny that stands here between the notion of the Volk and its formulation as a species composed of individuals agreeing in certain attributes. Destiny is therefore not interchangeable with the racial “type” (Art). It does not unify what is separate. The Volk that it designates knows neither unity nor disunity, because in the transcendence of its historizing it has always already reached beyond the isolation of the individual subjects as well as the isolation of the individual people. And yet, precisely because it reaches beyond the presence in which a people could recognise itself in its oneness, the Volk can just as little become the humanity that is the oneness of the peoples. For Heidegger, the Volk is not a point of indifference and the “anarchic attitude” that Hans Sluga discerns in the first division of Being and Time, §§9-44, cannot accordingly be said to retreat with the appearance of the Volk.¹⁶ The discussion of the notion of the Volk acknowledges the possibility and necessity of Dasein's radical individuation and, that is to say, "anarchy". The Volk does not pull the individual subjects into order since it is itself the anarchy of the fugitiveness of time.

Certainly a suspension of disbelief is required before considering whether the German people is the people of time, but so long as Heidegger's nationalism is taken to be utterly conventional the task of retracing the steps from Being and Time to National Socialism has simply not been addressed. Everybody knows who the Germans are, but for a certain strand of German nationalism, of which Thomas Mann's Reflections of a nonpolitical man can be taken as an expression, this is something that cannot be known without overlooking the Germans' distinctness from their positivistic neighbours. Heidegger's peculiarity within this strand of nationalism will have been to raise the Germans from being one question among others to being the questionable as such. Heidegger's philosophy does not find its way to the Volk as to the generality that would be its validating law. On the contrary, Heidegger attempts to think the utmost questionability and hence Being of Dasein by means of the Volk. The scandal of Heidegger's declarations of the consistency between his philosophy and his affiliation with National Socialism is that he was able to countenance an authoritarian regime for the sake of a suspected shared devotion to such an understanding of "folkishness". These declarations of consistency imply, in defiance of the liberal subject, an understanding of the most radical individuation for which the Volk is the "proper" domain.

Dasein's possibility and necessity of the most radical individuation rests with the Volk. Existing essentially as Being-with-Others, Dasein individuates itself as Dasein in the co-historizing that is the destiny of the Volk. This individuation is not one among others by which Dasein is differentiated. In §72 of Being and Time, Heidegger puts forward the thesis of the fundamental historicity of Dasein:

In analysing the historicity of Dasein we shall try to show that this entity is not 'temporal' because it 'stands in history', but that, on the contrary, it exists historically and can so exist only because it is temporal in the very basis of its Being.¹⁷

Dasein as Dasein stands in history and that is to say in co-history. It always individuates itself co-historically and thus, in line with Heidegger's explication of co-historizing, as the Volk. Other individuations are secondary. The accretion of exclusive properties whereby the individual persons "within" the Volk achieve distinctness simply obscures Dasein's radical difference from beings that are present-at-hand. Heterogeneity and homogeneity at the level of properties decide nothing with regard to membership in the Volk. The question of which individuals belong and do not belong to the Volk is not a question that can be raised without an inappropriate reliance on the individuation through properties. In §9, "The theme of the analytic of Dasein", Heidegger writes :

The essence of Dasein lies in its existence. Accordingly those characteristics which can be exhibited in this entity are not 'properties' present-at-hand of some entity which 'looks' so and so and is itself present-at-hand; they are in each case possible ways for it to be, and no more than that.¹⁸

This disqualification of properties from expositions of Dasein is irreconcilable with the biologism of National Socialism. A people that is biologically recognisable is always a people that is a class of individuals with common attributes, rather than a destiny. In 1933, however, Heidegger allows himself to be swayed by the NSDAP's invocations of the Volk. Heidegger's engagement with National Socialism, which never expressed itself in an endorsement of the latter's biologism, was inseparable from the ambition to reform its thinking in accordance with what Heidegger imagined to be its historical promise. Even after the end of the war Heidegger admitted a loyalty to this promise, denigrating everyone who was convinced of its unrealisability from the start and who thus contributed nothing to its realisation.¹⁹ National Socialism, grounding its notion of the Volk in biology rather than history, remained a movement without a destiny, a populism without a people. The self-assertion of the German people as the self-assertion of the essential historicity of Dasein did not take place.

But what for Heidegger is the Volk such that it can be missing, such that its self-assertion should be necessary? How can there be any politics whatsoever if there is no assurance of a people? Is Heidegger's notion of the missing Volk a philosophically insignificant appropriation of a Romantic trope? A response to these questions can be extrapolated from his exposition of the differential modes of Being-with-one-another. In §74 of Being and Time, to continue an earlier quotation, Heidegger further delineates the notion of destiny by which he defines the Volk:

Destiny is not something that puts itself together out of individual fates, any more than Being-with-one-another can be conceived as the occurring together of several Subjects. Our fates have already been guided in advance, in our Being with one another in the same world and in our resoluteness for definite possibilities. Only in communicating and struggling does the power of destiny become free.²⁰

The power of destiny that is the co-historizing of the Volk cannot be taken for granted since it is conditional on communication and struggle. When there is no communication or struggle to confront Dasein with its essence in Being-with-one-another, then the power of destiny remains inhibited — the historizing of Dasein, which is to say its co-historizing and the historizing of the people, is covered over. In a note appended to this passage Heidegger refers the reader to §26 on “The Dasein-with of Others and Everyday Being-with”. There he addresses the plurality of subjects from which he distinguishes the Volk and derives this plurality as an interpretation from a Being-with that is constituted, not in struggle and communication, but rather in disinterest:

So far as Dasein is at all, it has Being-with-one-another as its kind of Being. This cannot be conceived as a summative result of the occurrence of several ‘subjects’. Even to come across a number of ‘subjects’ [einer Anzahl von “Subjekten”] becomes possible only if the Others who are concerned proximally in their Dasein-with are treated merely as ‘numerals’ [“Nummer”]. Such a number of ‘subjects’ gets discovered only by a definite Being-with-and-towards-one-another. This ‘inconsiderate’ Being-with ‘reckons’ [“rechnet”] with the Others without seriously ‘counting on them’ [“auf sie zählt”], or without even wanting to ‘have anything to do’ with them.²¹

Inasmuch as Dasein is Being-with-one-another, it is unable to isolate itself from others. Heidegger indicates the dubiousness of its disinterest with quotation marks. Dasein does not revoke, but conceals its concern. Appearing not to want to have anything to do with others, Dasein forswears the struggle and communication by which the power of its own destiny as Being-with-one-another becomes free. This superficial unconcern obstructs the co-historizing of the Volk. The Volk is missing, but that is not to say that in struggling and communicating it ceases to be missing. It is missing in another way. Dasein, according to Heidegger, cannot concern itself with others as such, and thus with the Volk, by fixing its attention on subjects present-at-hand:

When Others are encountered, it is not the case that one's own subject is proximally present-at-hand and that the rest of the subjects, which are likewise occurrents, get discriminated beforehand and then apprehended; nor are they encountered by a primary act of looking at oneself in such a way that the opposite pole of a distinction first gets ascertained. They are encountered from out of the world, in which concernfully circumspective Dasein dwells. Theoretically concocted 'explanations' of the Being-present-at-hand of Others urge themselves upon us all too easily; but over against such explanations we must hold fast to the phenomenal facts of the case which we have pointed out, namely, that Others are encountered environmentally.²²

The others, with whom in its concern Dasein is the co-historizing of the Volk, are not met as beings present-at-hand. They come forward out of the world of Dasein, and it is as this world that they come forward. The others can only be met in a manner appropriate to their humanity, which is to say that they can only be met as the transcendens encompassing the presence of the present-at-hand. The others are met as that which, strictly speaking, cannot be met, since they cannot be reduced to presence. They can only be met through meeting them as world, through thinking the absence that is not incidental and remediable, but essential and thus a provocation for the understanding of Being as presence.

When Dasein does not want to "have anything to do" with others, it tries to ignore this provocation. The Volk that is missing — albeit missing in the sense in which the world in which Dasein, nonetheless, has its Being is missing — is then even missing as missing: the Volk's difference from the present-at-hand is itself absent. In the place of the Volk, and in a way as its reverse, das Man makes its appearance:

'The Others' whom one thus designates in order to cover up the fact of one's belonging to them essentially oneself, are those who proximally and for the most part 'are there' in everyday Being-with-one-another. The "who" is not this one, not that one, not oneself [man selbst], not some people [einige], and not the sum of them all. The 'who' is the neuter, the "they" [das Man].²³

Insofar as Dasein denies to itself its essential existence in Being-with-one-another, it denies its own transcendence. The distance that Dasein keeps from Others in its 'inconsiderate' Being-with does not individuate Dasein, but rather levels it:

This Being-with-one-another dissolves one's own Dasein completely into the kind of Being of 'the Others', in such a way, indeed, that the Others, as distinguishable and explicit, vanish more and more. In this inconspicuousness and unascertainability, the real dictatorship of the "they" is unfolded. We take pleasure and enjoy ourselves as they [man] take pleasure; we read, see, and judge about literature and art as they see and judge; likewise we shrink back from the 'great mass' as they shrink back.²⁴

Here conformity is made an affair of individualism, rather than of membership in the Volk. Denying its transcendence, Dasein stands back from the Others and thereby stands back from the question of Being. The neglect of the question of Being is the precondition of conformity, because, by not excluding the logical notion of the individual from discussions of the human, it simultaneously creates the possibility of a mass bringing into line. For Heidegger, the individual is already fundamentally conformist because he or she is faced in the utmost isolation of individuality only with that denial of the radical difference of transcendence which he or she has in common with every individual thing. In this conformity communication and struggle are drained of their vigour:

Overnight, everything that is primordial gets glossed over as something that has long been well known. Everything gained by a struggle becomes just something to be manipulated. Every secret loses its force.²⁵

The debasement of struggle and the vitiation of the secret are not the consequences of an encroachment of the “they” on the preserve of the individual. Struggle, as well as the possibility of the secret and its communication, presupposes Being-with-one-another and hence, contrary to the assertion of Lukács²⁶, Bourdieu²⁷ and many others, these passages in Being and Time cannot be read as elitist cultural critique. The opposite of the “they” is not at all the autonomous subject by which it is merely differently designated. Heidegger writes:

The Self of everyday Dasein is the they-self, which we distinguish from the authentic Self — that is, from the Self which has been taken hold of in its own way [eigens ergriffenen]. [...] If Dasein discovers the world in its own way [eigens] and brings it close, if it discloses to itself its own authentic Being, then this discovery of the ‘world’ and this disclosure of Dasein are always accomplished as a clearing-away of concealments and obscurities, as a breaking up of the disguises with which Dasein bars its own way.²⁸

This authentic self, as Heidegger explains, is not the autonomous subject:

Authentic Being-one's-Self does not rest upon an exceptional condition of the subject, a condition that has been detached from the "they"; *it is rather an existentiell modification of the "they" — of the "they" as an essential existentielle.*²⁹

As an essential existentielle, the "they" is Being-with-one-another, and the authentic Self that is its existentiell modification is the Dasein that understands itself as Being-with-one-another. This understanding and its abstention disclose and conceal Being-with-one-another, but do not prove anything against it in itself. The power of destiny that can or cannot become free is existentiell because as the co-historizing of the Volk it is a matter of disclosure, namely of the essential historicity of Dasein. The power of destiny in its unfreedom is the double absence of the Volk just as this absence is Dasein's obliviousness to its own Being. It could therefore be said that the Volk is not so much a being among beings as the understanding that raises the question of Being.

The Volk is defined by its ontological mission. For Heidegger, the Germans in their ontic conspicuousness under National Socialism quickly prove themselves to be a people in abeyance. In the lectures on Hölderlin from the mid thirties and early forties, the self-assertion of the German people proclaimed by National Socialism is indefinitely deferred. Heidegger's commentary from 1943 on Hölderlin's poem "Heimkunft" denies, for instance, that the inhabitants of the National Socialist fatherland can claim to have come home to the essence of Heimat: "this homecoming is the future of the historical being of the German people.”³⁰ Not having yet come home to the essence of Heimat, the Germans cannot truly be said to be at home. They have still to assert themselves as a people. More precisely, they have to assert themselves as the people whose essence lies in the deferral of its assertion as a people present-at-hand. Heidegger does not say that the homecoming of the Germans will take place in the future, but rather that it is the future: the essence of the Heimat to which the German people is to come is not something that can ever be present-at-hand. In the 1934-5 lecture course on the poems “Germanien” and “Der Rhein”, Heidegger speaks of the ignorance in which the German people persists with regard to itself as an ignorance with regard to its time:

We do not know who we are so long as we do not know our time. Our time, however, is that of the people between the peoples. Who knows this time? No one knows it in the sense that he could point it out and “date” it. Even those creative ones [jene Schaffenden], who dwell on the peaks of time, do not know it. One thing alone they know, namely when the time of the event of the true is not. Hölderlin says this at the beginning of the poem “The Titans”:

It is not however
The time. Still are they Unbound. The divine does not strike the indifferent.³¹

In this passage Heidegger implies that the time of the people between the peoples is the time of the event of the true. Heidegger’s people cannot know itself because it cannot know a time that is not there to be known. Its coming to itself depends on the unforeseeable event of the true, rather than on Hitler’s seizure of power, and it depends on the event of the true because it is as the event of the true that this people is to know itself. National Socialism, with its efforts to secure the distinctness of the people in the findings of a compliant biology, was unwilling to think the people in terms of temporality as such. In the 1941-2 lecture course on Hölderlin's poem "Andenken", Heidegger contends that a people finding itself in skull measurements and archaeological digs is unable to find itself as a people because it confounds that which is one's own (das Eigene) with something present-at-hand.³² Temporality, as Heidegger repeats again and again in Being and Time, is that which is one's own and the essence of Dasein. A people, as Dasein, can therefore only come to itself inasmuch as it does not come to itself, inasmuch as it knows itself as the temporality that can never be present to itself. With respect to knowing a people in its essential temporality and thus historicity, the peculiar scientism of National Socialism was, for all its taxonomical ingenuity, an evasion. National Socialism was only able to persuade itself that it grasped the singularity of the German people by paradoxically first suppressing even its difference from the present-at-hand. The ontological mission of raising a question against the understanding of Being as presence on the basis of an insight into the unique temporality of human Dasein is not allowed to become the German mission.

For Heidegger, the specificity of a people is reserved for the science of history and not for biology or the historiography that is archaeology. §76 of Being and Time offers the following negative definition of history:

In no science are the 'universal validity' of standards and the claims to 'universality' which the "they" and its common sense demand, less possible as criteria of 'truth' than in authentic historiology.³³

The “authentic historiology” of Macquarrie and Robinson’s translation is to be distinguished from the science of the “they”. Universality is compatible with the “they”, but incompatible with the historicity by which Heidegger defines a people. And it is incompatible, not because it misses the finer “nuances” of historicity, but because it rests on an understanding of temporality that presupposes historicity and likewise cannot make sense of it. Heidegger does not recite the nominalist objection to universality, since what he criticises is less the legitimacy of the subsumption of particulars than the discrete a-historical now in which the particular appears in its presence and thereby appears in the repeatability proper to the universal. The specificity of a people is not a particular in its irrevocable passage to the universal, but the specificity of time in its unrepeatability. A people apprehended in presence and analysed into a-historical properties is not “recognisable” as a people because its definitive historicity has been neglected. This historicity, inasmuch as it always sets itself at odds with universality, is therefore both the reason for the plurality of peoples and the impossibility of the proof of this plurality by exact numeration: the lone people would only be able to encounter its integrity in the oneness of presence, only therefore in that in which a people could never encounter the truth of its historicity. Overreaching presence and its visibility, historicity individuates without the surety of a recognition for the differences it effects. Historicity bastardizes without cease, and yet it never results in the homogeneous. Instead, it always already fragments the peoples and prevents their recuperation into new unities. Historicity, which is less a property of a people than its world, is the impracticability of a demarcation of the horizons of a world. That is to say, world is only able to be world insofar as it is not whole and does not sever itself from the transcendence that is the historicity of a people. A people can never assert itself as one people among many because the world that it is can never fully present itself as something present-at-hand without ceasing to be world. A people is thus essentially a being that is missing and a self-certain nationalism is always an absurdity.

Heidegger's disillusionment with National Socialism was inevitable. The people that asserted itself under the regime did not insist on its essential difference from that which is present-at-hand. Instead it effaced that difference through its preference for biologicistic properties. The chance of a contestation of the ontic determinability of Dasein was thus lost. In place of the bastardized specificity of a people National Socialism put forward the distinctness of a being present-at-hand. The particularism of the movement was, for all its vociferousness, at bottom too timid to break with the logic of the "type". In its scientistic formulations of the specificity of the German people, National Socialism wanted a specificity that nonetheless could be universally apprehended as such. The people is to be legitimated in its distinctness because it is to reveal itself incontestably as what it is in the clarity of presence, in the abstraction from its historicity. With the abstraction from historicity National Socialism retained the ontological basis of les Droits de l'Homme: the autonomous a-historical subject of liberalism is cut from the same cloth as the biologically apprehended specimen of the Aryan race. It is thus hard to see how Goebbels, with his consistent reliance on biologism, could have proclaimed in the first months of the regime the eradication from history of the year 1789. The National Socialist revolution simply re-enacted the French Revolution's disavowal of that which is a people's own. While the Jacobin motto "La force de la raison et la force du peuple, c'est la même chose" substituted the "they" of the cosmopolitan voice of the liberal subject for a people, National Socialism similarly de-historized the people by a reification and dissection into properties. In both revolutions, history as such went unthought and the people failed to "appear". Heidegger's disillusionment with National Socialism cannot, therefore, be interpreted as a softening of his opposition towards liberalism, since in its universalist misapprehension of the specificity of the Volk National Socialism had demonstrated the spuriousness of its own anti-liberalism.

Heidegger's people "appears" neither in 1789 nor in 1933. What appears in the two revolutions is too intent upon its own manifestness and visibility as a people to be mistaken for such. The self-assertion of a people is an affair of modesty. A people appears in its undecidable and unnamable specificity as a caesura, as "...", since its appearance is always its withdrawal from the field of the ontic determinations of Dasein. It is the essence of a people to be absent. Heidegger, who renews the Romantic longing for the people, implicitly disputes the National Socialist readings of that longing: the people that is missing in Romanticism does not await its realisation under National Socialism.³⁴ Heidegger's position should not, however, be characterised as a nostalgic depoliticisation of the Romantics' thinking of the German people.³⁵ Heidegger defers the emergence of the Volk precisely in order to think its historicity and thus the political. The apoliticality of German Romanticism in comparison with the Jacobins is itself already deceptive. The people that, in the French Revolution, appropriates for itself the power of legitimation formerly embodied in the person of the king does not grasp the political as the site of the historizing of a community. In its pretensions to stand as arbiter, it grasps itself as the universal and confuses the political with the domain of the subsumptions of scholastic logic. The powerlessness of the Volk of Romanticism should not be too quickly explained, which is to say explained away, by the negative circumstance of Germany's still larval bourgeoisie. Powerlessness does not merely distinguish the Volk from the people that had come to power in the French Revolution; it distinguishes it from the very logic of power in which the essence of the human goes unthought. Renan, naming Germany a land without a people, seemingly laments this absence whereby the nation was reduced to seeking its legitimacy elsewhere in the titles of successor to the Roman Empire and founder of the Carolingian.³⁶ A people, however, as a people, can never be a power of legitimation since it can never gather itself into the recognisable unity that could impose its will on the political realm. The task for Heidegger is to lose, rather than to find the Germans. And it could be argued that the Romantics wanted nothing besides. Deleuze and Guattari propose that the absence of a people was not the circumstance of Romanticism, but its goal:

What romanticism lacks most is a people. [...] Germany, German romanticism, had a genius for experiencing the natal territory not as deserted but as “solitary,” regardless of population density.³⁷

The people of Romanticism is scattered in its essential powerlessness. This can be noted even in the approach to publication: it is, in one respect, contrary to the intention of the Romantic folksong that it attract, instead of repel, an audience, as Lichtenberg was still able to perceive.³⁸ The hermetism of Romantic poetry is by no means a denial of the political realm. On the contrary, it is the peoples’ all too easy self-discovery in 1789 and 1933 that constitutes a denial of the political realm, since the “...” that is the site of the historizing of Dasein and its anarchy is buried beneath the onticality of an integral people.

A people must beware of finding itself too easily. The existentiell modification of authentic Being-with-one-another that has here been heuristically identified with the Volk finds itself in understanding and not in its unified appearance as a being present-at-hand. The revolutions of 1789 and 1933 are thus not so much popular uprisings as inscriptions of the people in traditional logic. In both cases, the people is formulated in terms of a type or universal: in the French Revolution it becomes a power of legitimation over each individual, while under National Socialism it constitutes the common and distinct identity of the race. The people that, as an existentiell modification, is not a given, stands in need of an uprising, but not of the kind in which its universalisation is substituted for an understanding of itself. Universalisation falls short of the essence of the Volk, since what is to be understood in and as the Volk is, for Heidegger, the co-historizing of Being-with-one-another. This co-historizing is the temporality that eludes the presence of the discrete “now” of the universal because it is the more originary temporality of the ecstases of human Dasein. As Being-in-the-world, Dasein always already converges with Others, and hence this convergence cannot be set apart from anarchy and made to depend upon the mediation of a universal. If subject and Volk are set in opposition in Heidegger’s writings, it is not an opposition of the individual and the universal, but rather of the a-historical and the historical: a people is not the universal of numerable individuals, and authentic Dasein is itself the Volk. Insofar as it is grounded in an understanding of Being as presence, the mediation of the universal, and the reified notion of the people it supports, are of an entirely other order than the struggle and communication associated with Heidegger’s notions of destiny and the Volk. It is only in the cessation of both struggle and communication, in the cessation of its understanding of ecstatic temporality, that Being-with is able to be seduced by its a-historical image in the mediation of singular and universal. The conformity of a given people to a universal, and hence its homogeneity, never reaches its essence as Being-with, and never distinguishes it as a people among other peoples, because the plurality of peoples is less the extrinsic numerability of unities than the difference that a people carries within itself as the transcendence of its historicity and its non-universality. For the same reason, a people that presses its sovereignty over the political realm asserts something other than itself. The sovereignty of a people is at odds with its essential politicality since, through becoming a power of legitimation in the shape of a universal, it forgets the non-identity proper to itself as the transcendence of Being-with-one-another in the constitution of the political. But then a people that does not seize power does not thereby automatically understand itself. It may simply be delivering power to a class, a clique or an individual, instead of understanding itself in the question of the very scope of power in the thought of that which in historicity is not present to be controlled. A people cannot find itself either in power or out of power, but only in that which is ontologically prior to power.

With respect to the Wars of Liberation, this entailed that the Napoleonic dictatorship was not so much to be supplanted as philosophically overcome. Where the opposition of the Romantics to popular sovereignty is often seemingly de facto, Hegel's opposition, by contrast, is de jure and at first sight it might thus appear that Heidegger's notion of the people is closer to Hegel's than to the Romantics'. Hegel repeatedly addresses the contradictory notion of popular sovereignty, but as his analyses figure in an apologetics of sovereignty, so it is solely in its dissemblance of sovereignty that the people is exhibited and thereafter passed over. In the lectures on the philosophy of history, Hegel condemns the notion of the people in the French Revolution by judging it according to the universality to which this people had itself laid claim. Criticising the purely formal freedom propagated by the French Revolution for furnishing the popular state with no more substantial a foundation than a temporary enthusiasm, Hegel describes the people of this freedom as not so much investing the existing governmental structures as abolishing their concrete universality in favour of an abstract and thus contradictorily one-sided universal.³⁹ And in his very last text, "The English Reform Bill", Hegel disparages the phrase "the sovereign people" in the French opposition press for its vacuity.⁴⁰ The people, through its inability to embody the concrete universal by which Hegel defines both knowledge and the state, consigns itself to the obscurantist margins of his political thinking. The Philosophy of Right is hence explicitly conceived as an attempt to set forth that which is but dimly and extrinsically foreshadowed in the universalist populism of the French Revolution: the Book of the State necessarily and excessively becomes the book of the truth of the people. Thereby any question as to whether the truth of the people might not deliver itself in a refinement of the Napoleonic dialectic of the individual of les Droits de l'Homme and the universal state of the First Empire is suppressed.

Hegel's assessment of the French notion of popular sovereignty is ultimately faithful to his ideal of non-polemical criticism. However, with the people of German Romanticism, with the people that never comes to power, nothing tempers his hostility. Here it is a matter of simple rejection rather than of elaboration. In its refusal to press a claim to the universal, the people of German Romanticism sets itself wholly at odds with knowledge. J. F. Fries in the Philosophy of Right and E. T. A. Hoffmann in the Aesthetics are subjected to ridicule without compunction or concession, because the substantiality of ethical life is exchanged in their writings, not even for the enthusiasm of revolutionary paroles, but rather for immediate sense-perception, for magnetism and clairvoyance. Without recourse to the universal the Volk dissipates. But it is precisely in this dissipation that it displays its irreducibility and specificity. Hegel, for whom everything is a hieroglyph of the concrete universal, is incapable of granting that the essence of a people could be other than Spirit.

Yet confronted with the self-assertion of the French people as the people of the universal, the German Volk of the Wars of Liberation could only truly maintain its specificity through its invention as the people of the unsublatably specific. At the hands of Romanticism, the abstract universals of the French Revolution were forced into a grotesque trial of strength with all that is most virulently parochial, antiquated and petty in German culture. Romanticism was never far removed from the art of the saboteur. Into the smooth space of a Europe that revolutionary imperialism first created, before sweeping across it in conquest, the Romantics injected a fatherland inaccessible beneath its garbage. Germany thereby reasserted itself in its barbaric specificity, in the idiocy by which the classical world named that which is inviolably and unenviably one's own.

Ahead of the invading armies the Romantics depopulated the countryside and the people that vanished left behind only the intractable and indigestible fragments of its superstitions. Tieck's Märchen are not dissimilar in principle to the burning of Moscow. The Nature of Romanticism is, in this respect, a scorched earth. It is only in fleeing French civilisation that the German people comes upon Nature, and comes upon it, fittingly stripped back to Naturerscheinungen, as the dystopia of logical mediation. The propensity in later German nationalist circles for biologicistic conceptions of the people has its roots in this political appropriation of Nature by the Romantics, no matter how little the appropriation was understood in its intended disruption of the reconciliation of the individual and the universal.⁴¹ The Nature of German Romanticism is less the ground on which the specificity of the people might be established and secured for universal recognition than the abyss in which it is scattered as hallucinations, secrets, magical interventions and somnambulism. In its inability to come to itself, this people is the abolition of the Enlightenment, rather than its sublation in Hegel's Absolute Spirit. The abstract universal of the autonomous subject does not give way to the Prussian State. Instead, the political stage is cleared for will-o'-the-wisps. Under Romanticism the polis is to be rethought from its very beginnings.

The Volk is missing and in the 1920s, in conditions at once reminiscent and infinitely removed from the Wars of Liberation, National Socialism went looking for a people. Repudiating the possibility of democracy in the absence of a people, the movement insinuated into the political discourse of the Weimar Republic the topoi of Romanticism. As the populism of a people to come, National Socialism could deny itself any accommodation to the existing governmental structures and yet, through the citation of precedents, insist on a fundamental conservatism. In its indifference to matters of public doctrine and in its devotion to genealogy, the movement applied itself to the mass detection of forerunners. Hence, even as it declared the national revolution in 1933 and set about the provision of schooling in Rassenkunde for the people that had come, the new regime still urged its consanguinity with incompatible previous formulations of the notion of the German Volk. That Heidegger could have sought admittance to the NSDAP despite his rejection of its biologism is largely inexplicable without this amorphousness of the official ideology. Although in hindsight the openness with which the regime appeared to address the question of the people was unmistakably its indiscriminate responsiveness to the shibboleth of “Volk”, Heidegger, for the sake of what he considered to be National Socialism’s promise of a revelation of the absence proper to historicity, turned a blind eye to this lack of discrimination.

But then the continuity of German nationalism was not in general subjected to criticism. Patriotic texts such as Fichte’s Addresses to the German Nation from 1808 could thus be interpreted by zealots of the movement as an anticipation of National Socialist thinking. Max Wundt, Alfred Baeumler, and various lesser figures in the Deutsche Philosophische Gesellschaft, all paid homage to Fichte. But what was the similarity, if any, between Fichte’s definition of the Germans and the racist theories of the movement? In the seventh address Fichte famously passes over everything positive to arrive at his typology of the German people:

All who either are themselves alive and creative and productive of new things, or who, should this not have fallen to their lot, at any rate definitely abandon the things of naught and stand on the watch for the stream of original life to lay hold of them somewhere, or who, should they not even be so far advanced as this, at least have an inkling of freedom and do not hate it or take fright at it, but on the contrary love it — all these are original men; they are, when considered as a people, an original people, the people simply, Germans.⁴²

There is nothing of the biological in this definition. Whoever loves freedom is German. By 1808, le peuple of the French Revolution, which had defined itself by its love of freedom, rather than by national characteristics, had shown, through its submission to the Napoleonic dictatorship, the spuriousness of its love of freedom. In contrast, the Germans, so long as they combat their oppression, are seen as the people that loves freedom and are hence the people. And this people, in the singular, is also always “our” people because it is that which stands closest to us in the philosophically original freedom of humanity. Inasmuch as Fichte’s Addresses to the German Nation were already established as canonical texts of German nationalism in Wilhelmine Germany, later nationalist movements invariably seemed more indebted to their disquisitions than was, in fact, the case. The genealogical legitimacy of the nationalism of National Socialism was a moot point on which ideologues of the movement expended a frantic ingenuity. The people that asserts itself in 1933 does not, and dares not, entirely renounce its Romanticism.

Given the intellectual promiscuity of National Socialism, it is impossible, as is often noted, to set forth National Socialist thinking in anything like a comprehensive set of theses. The nationalism of the NSDAP eludes definition and has always already overtaken every critique directed at it from a nationalistic position. Heidegger’s engagement and disengagement with National Socialism are complicated by this equivocality. Deviations become indistinguishable from expansions and conformances take on the appearance of containments. Admitting, as it were, the interpenetration of his engagement and disengagement, Heidegger published in 1953 the following remarks on “the inner truth” of National Socialism:

The works that are being peddled about nowadays as the philosophy of National Socialism but have nothing whatever to do with the inner truth and greatness of this movement (namely the encounter between global technology and modern man) — have all been written by men fishing in the troubled waters of “values” and “totalities.”⁴³

This passage from an Introduction to Metaphysics is almost as inscrutable as National Socialism itself. Its year of publication excludes at least one reading, namely, that Heidegger is here paying lip service to the regime. The parenthesis elucidating the “inner truth” of National Socialism is more than likely to date from a period subsequent to the 1935 summer semester in which Heidegger delivered the text in a course of lectures. Absolute certainty on this point is, however, impossible because the page in question is missing from the otherwise intact manuscript in the Heidegger Archive at Marbach. Rainer Marten, privy to the consultations surrounding the publication of the lectures, has divulged that the parenthesis was Heidegger’s concession to the editorial assistants advising him to delete the inflammatory sentence in its entirety.⁴⁴ When the parenthesis turned out not to forestall controversy, Heidegger saw fit in a letter reproduced in Die Zeit on September 24, 1953, to endorse an earlier reading by Christian Lewalter. On August 13, Lewalter had argued, in Die Zeit, that the sentence amounted to a condemnation of National Socialism. Heidegger’s clarificatory intervention was too exceptional a gesture, and its circumstances too obviously crucial to the casting of his post-war reputation, for anything here to be straightforward. Thirteen years later the interview with Der Spiegel, “Only a God Can Save Us”, is perhaps even more tortuous. There the rectorship becomes a series of compromises with the NSDAP, and any tie between Heidegger’s thinking and the regime is pushed into the background: any attempt at an exposition of this tie is taken as little more than a foray into persecution. Was Heidegger a Nazi? Was National Socialism Heideggerian? These questions, however, do not yet say anything, and hence it is imperative that those passages in which Heidegger is at least to some degree open about his engagement not be relinquished. In 1953 Heidegger is still able to defend the “inner truth” of the movement against its usurpation in the value-philosophy of Bruno Bauch and the totality-philosophy of Ernst Krieck. The ambiguity in the doctrine of the NSDAP that permitted conflicting presentations of its unspoken truth likewise rendered impossible its own exhaustive realisation. Heidegger in 1953 stands by the “inner truth” of a movement too nebulous to have received its refutation in the Second World War. Unwilling to countenance the provocation of this fidelity, Silvio Vietta neglects the “inner truth” and fixes upon the “greatness” of the movement in his commentary on the text:

Nobody who has read the Contributions to Philosophy will be able to say that the concept of “quantity”, of the “gigantic” and therefore of “greatness” is being used here in a positive sense.⁴⁵

Vietta’s dedication to apologetics represses Heidegger’s (retrospective) insight into his engagement with National Socialism and offers — and then only implicitly, such is its reverence — the philosophical vacuity of an error of judgement. In 1953, after having carried out a protracted, if covert polemic against National Socialism in the wartime lectures on Nietzsche and Hölderlin, Heidegger still maintains that the “inner truth” of the movement differed from what was, for him, its exoteric truth as the acceleration and intensification of technicism. Here the reality of the movement is being condemned by its promise.

What Heidegger understands by the promise of National Socialism is set forth at greater length in an earlier, likewise notorious passage from An Introduction to Metaphysics. Expounding the opposition between German nationalism and technicism and foreseeing a people that will as a people avert the destruction of Europe, Heidegger writes:

This Europe, in its ruinous blindness forever on the point of cutting its own throat, lies today in a great pincers, squeezed between Russia on one side and America on the other. From a metaphysical point of view, Russia and America are the same; the same dreary technological frenzy, the same unrestricted organization of the average man. [...]

We are caught in a pincers. Situated in the center, our people incurs the severest pressure. It is the people with the most neighbours and hence the most endangered. With all this, it is the most metaphysical of peoples. We are certain of this definition, but our people will only be able to wrest a destiny from it if within itself it creates a resonance, a possibility of resonance for this definition, and takes a creative view of its tradition. All this implies that this people, as a historical people, must move itself and thereby the history of the West from within the center of their future “happening” into the primordial realm of the powers of Being. If the great decision regarding Europe is not to bring annihilation, that decision must be made in terms of new spiritual energies unfolding historically from out of the center.⁴⁶

With its definition of “our people” as “the most metaphysical of peoples”, this passage employs a trope of German cultural nationalism.⁴⁷ But Heidegger’s use of this trope involves a particular understanding of “metaphysics”. Is the most metaphysical people here the most nationalistic? And is nationalism to be understood as metaphysics?

According to this geophilosophical excursus, America and Russia do not differentiate themselves. The specificity that would belong to them as peoples, and constitute the basis of a nationalism, is annulled in their programmatic standardisation of humanity and their immersion in technicism. Owing to their positions on a periphery flimsily characterised by its distance from Central Europe, America and Russia are poor in neighbours and thus not endangered. The people that is richest in neighbours is the most endangered people and also the most metaphysical. It confronts the danger, not of effacing itself in the identity of one of its many neighbours, but rather of losing itself in the anonymity in which its neighbours have already lost themselves. The nationalism to which Heidegger could be read as exhorting the people of the centre is thus less the assertion of a given people's distinct identity among the distinct identities of neighbouring peoples than the assertion of the non-universality of a people against global anonymity. What is at issue in this nationalism is not the identification and documentation of unique properties, but instead that which in a people as such sets it apart from the uniform organization of reified humanity. Such a nationalism must ask after that which is not present-at-hand. For Heidegger, this is metaphysics (it is only in subsequent texts that metaphysics is no longer interpreted as the question of Being, but rather as Seinsvergessenheit). The people of the centre remains as yet the Volk because it is metaphysical. The Volk thinks the difference of Being from that which is present-at-hand and manipulable by technology, and it thinks this difference as the truth of its own historicity. The Volk is never anything other than spiritual because it is never other than thoughtful. In the language of Being and Time, the Volk is an existentiell modification. However certain Heidegger may be of the correctness of his definition (Bestimmung) of the Germans, it is, as a vocation (Bestimmung), also a definition whose time has not yet come: the definiendum has still to bring itself into agreement with the definiens. Only as the people of metaphysics will the Germans be able to fulfil their mission. Only as the people that is nothing but a “folkish” science and an understanding of the worldliness of its Being-with-one-another, will they be able to transpose the West from the unchecked disposability and hence destructibility of beings under technicism into the originary realm of the powers of Being. The German mission thus reaches beyond the Germans by not reaching beyond their essence as a people. The scope of the German mission is not, however, a clandestine universalism. The Germans are to raise the promised question concerning the essence of Being less on behalf of other peoples than against the standardisation by which the various peoples have fallen away from the possibility of grasping their own essential historicity.

The new spiritual energies of the centre are to unfold historically. Unless Heidegger’s juxtaposition of “spiritual” and “historically” is to be understood as an uncharacteristic subordination of “historicality” to “spirit”, “spirit” is not here being given a sense in conformity with the metaphysics of subjectivity. Derrida contends in Of Spirit that, with his opposition to the biologism of National Socialism, Heidegger lapses into the metaphysics of subjectivity:

One cannot demarcate oneself from biologism, from naturalism, from racism in its genetic form, one cannot be opposed to them except by reinscribing spirit in an oppositional determination, by once again making it a unilaterality of subjectivity, even if in its voluntarist form. The constraint of this program remains very strong, it reigns over the majority of discourses which, today and for a long time to come, state their opposition to racism, to totalitarianism, to nazism, to fascism, etc., and do this in the name of spirit, and even of the freedom of (the) spirit, in the name of an axiomatic — for example, that of democracy or “human rights” — which, directly or not, comes back to this metaphysics of subjectivity.⁴⁸

Derrida’s criticism turns upon a direct association of oppositional determination with the metaphysics of subjectivity. Heidegger’s “spirit” stands in opposition to biologism, but that is not to say that it is determined by this opposition as a being present in its distinctness. “Spirit” is in opposition to “matter”, and yet it is not the spirit that comes to itself as the subject in opposition to matter, in a specious opposition to that which is present-at-hand. It does not come to itself because to do so, to be present before matter in its presence would denote precisely a mitigation of its opposition to the ontological foundations of matter in the understanding of Being as presence. Heidegger’s “spirit” does not stand in an oppositional determination to the biologism of Nazi Germany or the technological frenzy of Russia and America because it is defined rather by the transcendence that precedes and ontologically encompasses all of them. The simultaneous opposition and contamination of “spirit” is to be explained less by reference to the “mistake” of a lapse into the metaphysics of subjectivity than to the very nature of transcendence. Heidegger’s “metaphysical” people is anything but the unambiguous concomitant of a biologically determined race. Its metaphysicality is not a property that it would possess in the manner of physical attributes such as levels of pigmentation. Its metaphysicality is not its identifiability, but on the contrary its historicity and hence undecidability. To be pure enough to be pronounced either guilty or innocent would constitute, for the Volk of Being and Time, a surrender to the understanding of Being as presence.

The essence of the Germans is their mission and this mission is to be the Volk, to be the spirit that to the extent that it does not become universal is to unfold outward from the centre to America and Russia. In his study of the utterances of National Socialism,

Jean-Pierre Faye remarks upon the etymological association of “diutisk” and “völkisch”, calling the Germans “the people of tautology”.⁴⁹ It is nonetheless a tautology that Heidegger sets to work. The Germans are to be the people for the West as a whole, since they alone are still capable of preserving a distance from the “humanity” of the cosmopolitanism of the technologically undifferentiated. They preserve this distance in the questionability of metaphysics. This questionability, which is irreducible to the universal of the “they”, is the element of the historicity of the Volk, of the struggling and the communicating of authentic Being-with-one-another. Running away from the vitiated inauthentic communication of the universal, a people always runs towards a more authentic confrontation in the question of Being. What is thereby communicated and brought to the fore is the transcendence essential to communication and not any content whose reiterability could be mistaken for the basis of communication. It is accordingly in terms of a dialogue, in which everything rests on the “between” of the parties, that Heidegger in 1937 treats the relations between France and Germany. In the essay “Paths to Dialogue”, included in the volume Alemannenland. Ein Buch von Volkstum und Sendung, he warns against a too placid interpretation of communicating:

Authentic understanding of one another does not engender that tranquillity which at once deteriorates into a mutual indifference. On the contrary, it is in itself the unrest of the reciprocal self-questioning out of concern for the shared historical tasks.⁵⁰

Understanding between peoples neither levels nor codifies their differences. It puts the identities of the peoples in question. Heidegger’s nationalism is neither pacifist nor isolationist, because a people asserts itself in its questionability against the self-evidence of that which is everywhere the same. National Socialism, which was likewise neither pacifist nor isolationist, nonetheless betrayed its own “folkish” promise by not rigorously carrying through its assertion of the people to a global confrontation with technicism.

For Heidegger, the Third Reich was ultimately too little of a pariah among the neighbouring nations of technicism. The regime’s failure to differentiate itself is manifest even in the racial policies for which its military opponents reserved their greatest vilification. The National Socialist concept of race remains subject to technicism because the beings to which it applies are exhaustively defined by properties and present themselves as material for manipulation. For the sake of certainty and the transhistorical iterability of its judgements, the Rassenkunde of the regime situated its field of study in the present-at-hand. Unable and unwilling to contest the thinking of modern science in anything but details, the National Socialist ideologues of race brought to the question of the essence of a people an inapposite and paranoiac demand for certainty. The fancied self-evidence of the notion of certainty itself was the excuse for the open stifling of the questionability of the essence of a people as something negligently inexact. From the uncontestability of a distinction grounded in “facts”, anti-Semitism, for instance, was to be invested with a semblance of consistency and realism. That the biologicistic efforts of the movement in Rassenkunde were directed precisely against the questionability of the essence of a people can be inferred from the writings of Hitler himself. For the space of a moment in Mein Kampf, Hitler appears to acknowledge the irrelevance of properties when he recalls an episode from his youth in Vienna:

Once, as I was strolling through the Inner City, I suddenly encountered an apparition in a black caftan and black hair locks. Is this a Jew? was my first thought.

For, to be sure, they had not looked like that in Linz. I observed the man furtively and cautiously, but the longer I stared at this foreign face, scrutinizing feature after feature, the more my first question assumed a new form:

Is this a German?⁵¹

It goes without saying that the uncanniness of this incident did not become the occasion for a deepening of the questionability of the question of a people. When National Socialism comes to put the question of a scientific basis, it is simply in order to avoid it as a question. The identity of the German people is resolved into the properties of something present-at-hand and rendered certain. The question that asks “Who are the Germans?” is rephrased to read “What are the Germans?”, since reification is the safeguard of the people’s purity against the contamination characteristic of existentialia. The question “What are the Germans?” is National Socialism’s invitation to kitsch. Alpine panoramas and Nordic sagas, granite nudes and granite temples, blond braids and trench warfare are all swept up to be reinvented as fetishes of a people that is missing. This evidentiality of the Germans is simultaneously their bad faith, since what is adduced is never a people. National Socialism was thus incapable of disputing the etymology of “deutsch” that Nietzsche proposes in Beyond Good and Evil: the tiusche Volk is the Täusche-Volk, the people of deceit.⁵² In order not to deceive, in order to bring forward “das Deutsche” in absolute clarity, National Socialism courted recognition. Letting the question of the people lapse and thus maintaining world in its oblivion, the regime solicited the attentions of its neighbours through the mendacious positivism of its conception of the Germans. The self-determination denied at Versailles was not so much made good as exaggerated to the point of parody: National Socialism was kitsch transformed into imperialism. Having staked German identity on positive attributes, the movement was, in one sense, bound from the start to a military campaign for global domination. Berlin was to become the aggressive distribution hub for “folkish” paraphernalia and everything bar the symbol and stereotype would be eradicated as an obstacle to recognition. Germany would be recognised at whatever cost. As such illusory self-determination dares ask no more of the recognising bodies than a mere acknowledgement of its compliance to cliché, Nazi Germany could at the same time not allow itself to be recognised. Its very recognisability was, in the end, an affliction and a sign of weakness to be remedied by the annihilation of the recognising bodies. The wars of aggression that National Socialism waged against its neighbours were, in this respect, reactive. Nazi imperialism was the hysteric regurgitation of the symbol and the stereotype, its racism — in both its affirmative and negative evaluations — its very acquiescence to the universal.

Already in 1934 Lévinas was in a position to expose the anti-cosmopolitanism of the new regime as a sham. In his article “Reflections on the Philosophy of Hitlerism”, first published in Esprit, there is the following exposition and analysis:

Any rational assimilation or mystical communion between spirits that is not based on a community of blood is suspect. And yet the new type of truth cannot renounce the formal nature of truth and cease to be universal. In vain is truth my truth in the strongest sense of this possessive pronoun, for it must strive towards the creation of a new world. [...]

How is universality compatible with racism? The answer — to be found in the logic of what first inspires racism — involves a basic modification of the very idea of universality. *Universality must give way to the idea of expansion.*⁵³

A truth that is mine alone is a contradiction. In racism, according to Lévinas, universality is modified rather than renounced, since it cannot be renounced without likewise renouncing any claim to truth. The military operations of Hitlerian Germany can accordingly be viewed as a half-measure, as testimony to the apprehensiveness with which National Socialism set about breaking with the universal. Even before it declared war, the regime was in the wrong, and it was the sentence passed on its chauvinism by the universal that it sought to reverse by global conquest. Lévinas, who, in the above quotation, sees the parallel between the universality of an idea and the universalism of imperialist expansion, does not however hesitate in his subsequent anti-Romantic exoneration of the idea, “for the expansion of a force presents a structure that is completely different from the propagation of an idea.”⁵⁴ Contrary to his earlier analysis, National Socialism is thus to be understood as the unqualified alternative to the universality of the idea it nevertheless apes. The possibility of a genuine confrontation with the universal thereby remains unexamined.

Lévinas does not go beyond a morphology of the universal. What he musters against racist imperialism is the spreading of an idea: the conscience-salving myth of the cultural benevolence of French colonialism receives a new lease on life through the comparison with Hitler’s territorial ambitions. Having no idea to propagate, and thus having nothing to offer the subject peoples in an “exchange”, Hitler is able to aspire to nothing more than a universality maintained by an external and inscrutable force. Since for Lévinas the desirability of universality is never doubted, the deliberate act of offering that which cannot be accepted and rendered universal is nonsensical. By this account, the people’s detritus by means of which the German Romantics sought to resist the conquering French liberalism was, in its irreconcilability with the universal, simply detritus. In this text, Lévinas displays a Hegelian disregard for the essential meagreness of a people. Isolating racism with regard to its simulation of the universality of the idea, he does not ask whether the question of the people is not similarly counterfeited in racism’s community of blood. Yet, as Lévinas himself suggests, the logic of what first inspires racism is not the question of a people but expansionism. Rather than the singularity of a people, the allegedly universal quantitative matter that, in its unequal distribution determines the inferiority and superiority of respective peoples, is the ultimate foundation of racism. Racism is already too removed from race, in the direction of the universal by which the necessarily inessential superiority of a people is judged, for its anti-cosmopolitanism to be substantial. Although it does not propagate an idea in Lévinas's sense of a cultural artefact, it does attempt to compel recognition of its own claim to instantiate the idea of the power of blood. The ferocity and clamorousness with which National Socialism pursued its ethnic policies should not consequently be misunderstood. Having come to signify the ne plus ultra of racism, the regime nonetheless did not surpass the Romantics in their dedication to the question of the people. The incompatibility of the question of the people with universality was not acknowledged.

To draw a distinction between racism and the questioning with regard to the essence of a people does not of course establish the "innocence" of Heidegger's engagement with National Socialism. This engagement is overdetermined. Confronted with its ambiguity, and indignant at a perceived neglect of the people in Being and Time, Ernst Krieck interprets Heidegger's rectoral address as a cynical adaptation to the year 1933.⁵⁵ Similarly distancing Heidegger all too quickly from the regime, Jean Beaufret will embark after the war on an almost militant programme of exculpation.⁵⁶ But that Heidegger would have applied for membership in the NSDAP, with a view to furthering his career, only once the party was in power seems implausible given his subsequent refusal of the more prestigious chairs at the Universities of Berlin and Munich. Strikingly, the explanation of his refusal, "Warum bleiben wir in der Provinz?", has less to do with ambition than with an inventory of the commonplaces of rustic literature. And that Heidegger's involvement with the regime was but a momentary lapse in judgement, a blind spot unassimilable with his character and work, is a decreasingly tenable interpretation: the letter by Heidegger from 1929, published in Die Zeit by Ulrich Sieg⁵⁷, expresses an anti-Semitism that the inordinate controls on the Marbach archive must be suspected of wishing to conceal. For Heidegger, more was at stake in 1933 than the question concerning the essence of the people. If this question can illuminate his political engagement, it nonetheless cannot fully account for it just as it cannot be conflated with every aspect of the Hitlerian regime: contiguity is other than identity.

The absence of this reservation leads Habermas's presentations of Heidegger's thinking into the realm of caricature. In his defence of the universal, Habermas exploits the overdetermination of Heidegger's engagement with National Socialism. Once the question concerning the essence of a people has been associated with anti-Semitism, or with any of the other enormities of the regime, then the task of a meticulous refutation of Heidegger's critique of universality readily appears superfluous. In The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity, Habermas is keen to suggest a connection between totalitarianism and Heidegger's abandonment of Husserl's definition of truth in favour of the rootedness that he attributes in 1933 to a "folkish" science. Habermas's argument for the philosophical restoration of global intersubjectivity proceeds by innuendo. Referring to the critique of reason that Heidegger grounds in the history of Being, he writes:

It reserves the title of truth for the so-called truth occurrence, which no longer has anything to do with a validity-claim transcending space and time. The truths (emerging in the plural) of this temporalized Ursprungsphilosophie are in each case provincial and yet total; they are more like the commanding expressions of some sacral force fitted out with the aura of truth.⁵⁸

Habermas sets forth the truths of the Heideggerian Ursprungsphilosophie as simulacra possessing no more than the aura of truth. The sacral force of these provincial, yet total truths is a mere substitute for the truth defined for Habermas by its transcendence of space and time. The Heideggerian truth occurrence (Wahrheitsgeschehen), with its mere aura of truth, becomes a travesty of the universal. To the extent that it no longer has anything to do with a validity-claim transcending space and time, the truth occurrence has to content itself, according to Habermas, with issuing decrees. Heidegger's destruction of the correspondence theory of truth is made to arrive at the commanding expressions of ideology, rather than the clearing of beings. For Habermas, to break with the understanding of truth modelled on the conception of law and its transcendence of space and time, is to espouse a dubious understanding of truth modelled on the conception of decree. With this non sequitur, philosophy's fortunes are tied for ever to the State: only that which is modelled on the conception of law can be true. If Heidegger's so-called truth occurrence no longer has anything to do with a validity-claim that transcends space and time, it is not because it is satisfied with the narrower scope of a decree. Heidegger's writings are remarkably lacking in the decrees that Habermas attributes to them.

Heidegger does not choose between the law and the decree, between the eternally and momentarily binding truth, and he does not choose because this choice plays itself out in the presence of derivative temporality as the dilemma of the individual and the universal. Habermas's options presuppose the clearing of beings in originary temporality, which, as the ground of beings, is likewise their truth and the truth of Habermas's own understanding of truth. Defining truth by a static identity transcending time and space, Habermas does not admit the possibility of a truth that, in never ceasing to transcend, transcends even this transcendence of time and space. That by which Heidegger's understanding of truth exceeds presence is, for Habermas, its deficiency, its dissipation in an aura. Habermas sets himself up as the apologist of the rule of law and, with the innuendo of “provincial and yet total”, “commanding expressions” and “aura of truth”, implies a reducibility of Heidegger’s thinking to the regime to which he confessed an allegiance. It is as though, having been bundled under the rubric of National Socialism, whatever in Heidegger’s thinking challenges the universal could be ipso facto dismissed. To put it at its bluntest: Auschwitz again becomes a means of silencing minorities, since the argument that, with an air of probity, expends itself on the nationalism of genocide slyly takes in every configuration of the social field that would contest its homogenisation in Habermas’s static identity. The question concerning the essence of a people is the question of the validity of the validity-claims that transcend space and time — as such it is suspect for Habermas. What Habermas misses in Heidegger’s engagement is that which is essentially missing: he believes he “sees” the Volk when all he sees is Völkermord.

In Nazi Germany the people is not that which makes itself visible everywhere. On this point Habermas is too credulous. Falling behind the Romantics, National Socialism also fell behind its own victims with respect to the modesty of the essence of a people. If this modesty was the “inner truth” of the movement, and hence the proof of its outer falsehood, the “folkish” politics by which it had characterised itself could not but have become an unbearable affront in the shape of the minorities existing under its dictatorship. Incapable of carrying through the rupture with the transnational, the regime visited genocide on the minorities from within whose powerlessness the question concerning the essence of a people still sounded. In the end the Umbruch of 1933, which had portended for the Germans the chance of a “folkish” science, was itself the obstruction standing between them and their vocation as the “metaphysical” people. Having asserted itself, only to be diverted at once through technicism and imperialism from its essence in the question of Being, the Volk had become nothing but its own impossibility. Giving itself up entirely to its visibility, it surrendered the modesty in which it could have asked after the non-presence of Being. It had asserted itself as the Volk without becoming the understanding of temporality that defines the Volk. It is his attention to this contradiction that excuses the conspicuous alarmism with which Heidegger, in the years of Hitler's dictatorship, surveys the obliviousness of Being, since the obliviousness of Being, discussed with Spinozistic equanimity in 1927, is an essential possibility of Dasein, whereas it is the impossibility of the existentiell modification that is the Volk. When Heidegger speaks of a "folkish" science in 1933, he speaks of a science that knows itself, rather than of a science that stands over against the people that it takes for its object. Not every science is "folkish", because not every science knows its own rootedness. It is the knowledge of this rootedness rather than its mere actuality that constitutes for Heidegger the "folkishness" of a science and the consummation of knowledge. The Volk knows itself as the Volk, and that is to say it knows itself in its world in its difference from beings present-at-hand. A "folkish" movement that, notwithstanding its "folkishness", exacerbates the obliviousness of Being could accordingly have been viewed by Heidegger only with incredulity and dismay.

And yet, at least to begin with, this is not the case. The people that is suddenly present everywhere is to be the occasion of the questioning concerning the essence of Being. Heidegger's engagement with National Socialism is clearly inextricable from his ontology. This thesis, which is familiar from innumerable polemics, remains superficial so long as it is not elaborated in an exposition of the philosophical course of this engagement. For Heidegger, in 1933, ontology was the affair of that which, in the jargon of National Socialism, was denominated "völkische Wissenschaft". This instance of linguistic submissiveness appears scarcely resuscitable. By using the loaded word "völkisch" and not "volklich", "volkhaft" or for that matter "populär", Heidegger marries his notion of a people's science to the infamy preordained for National Socialism in its entirety. But, it must be asked, to what extent was Heidegger simply adopting a notion already articulated by the ideologues of the movement? When Heidegger in the late thirties and early forties explicitly criticises the idea of a völkische Wissenschaft, it is without abandoning that conjunction of a people and understanding which in 1933 he endeavoured to think within the jargon of National Socialism: völkische Wissenschaft is criticised as a science not of the people but of the subject masquerading as a people. For an intimation of what was at stake for Heidegger in 1933, of what was to be won and of what was lost, the conjunction of a people and the understanding of Being has to be examined in its equivocal relations to National Socialism. The Umbruch of the National Socialist revolution, inasmuch as it interpreted itself as the overthrow and elimination of Western liberalism at the hands of a “folkish” uprising, appeared to repeat on a larger scale the partisan response of the Romantics to the Napoleonic abstract universal. With the attempt to grasp the world of the Volk, the prevailing understanding of all beings as present-at-hand was no longer to be merely contested, but overcome in the questioning with regard to the unthought essence of Being. For this task the Volk of National Socialism proved however to be too Cartesian.

The many scattered anti-Cartesian objections that, after his rectorship, Heidegger raises to the ideas of Volk and völkische Wissenschaft, are not alien to his early thought in their argumentation. It cannot, therefore, be assumed that through these objections Heidegger is disowning that which he himself had understood in 1933 by the term völkische Wissenschaft.⁵⁹ The objections can be plausibly read as clarifications, and even defences, of the latter notion.

For example, in the Contributions to Philosophy of 1936-8, Heidegger denounces the expediency that renders a “folkish” science essentially cosmopolitan:

Only a thoroughly modern (i.e., “liberal”) science can be “a folkish science”. Only on the basis of prioritizing procedure over the subject-matter and the accuracy of judgement over the truth of beings does modern science permit an adjustable shifting to various purposes, depending on need (implementation of extreme materialism and technicism by Bolshevism; introduction of four-year plans; usefulness for political education). In all of this, science is everywhere the same and becomes, precisely with these various goal-settings, basically and increasingly more uniform, i.e., more “international”.⁶⁰

By placing “a folkish science” (»eine völkische Wissenschaft«) in quotation marks, Heidegger indicates that the term is not to be taken at face value. In disregard of the National Socialist antithesis of “liberal” and “folkish”, a “folkish” science is here said to be, at bottom, a modern science. Expediency for the Volk (expressed in the slogan, “Wahr ist, was dem Volke nützt”) is only possible on the provision that the Volk has assumed the cast of the Cartesian subject and thus stands in an ontic opposition to that which is to be manipulated and exploited. By prioritising mathematical procedure over the matter of thought and certainty over the ecstatic truth of beings, Descartes flattened the phenomenon of world to what could be wielded in the service of the needs of the moment. The “politicisation” of science under National Socialism only made science still more liberal, because its subordination to the “good” of the Volk necessitated the hardening of the subjective, de-worlded, and hence cosmopolitan, starting point of modern science. In spite of its polemics against liberalism, National Socialism retained the place of the individual in science and saw to it that it was occupied by the people. The modern identity of expediency and science, which had come under threat in the demythologisation of the subject, was to be shored up by sheer weight of numbers. Through its notion of the people, National Socialism unwittingly revealed itself to be liberalism’s response to its critics.⁶¹

When, in the 1942-3 lecture course Parmenides, Heidegger dismisses the antithesis of Volk and individual, he thereby repeats a gesture from Being and Time but in order to deliver the Volk up at once to liberalism:

The concepts of “people” [die Volkheit] and “folk” [das Völkische] are founded on the essence of subjectivity and Ego. Only when metaphysics, i.e., the truth of beings as a whole, has been founded on subjectivity and the Ego do the concepts of “nation” and “people” obtain that metaphysical foundation from which they might possibly have historical relevance. Without Descartes, i.e., without the metaphysical foundation of subjectivity, Herder, i.e., the foundation of the concept of a people [die Gründung der Volkheit der Völker], cannot be thought. Whether one can retrospectively establish historiographical relations between these two is a matter of indifference, since historiographical relations are always only the façade, and for the most part the concealing façade, of historical nexuses. As long as we know with insufficient clarity the proper essence of subjectivity as the modern form of selfhood, we are prey to the error of thinking that the elimination of individualism and of the domination of the individual is ipso facto an overcoming of subjectivity.⁶²

In this passage the Volk is seen to rest on the subject rather than to stand in opposition to the metaphysics of Seinsvergessenheit. Is Heidegger therefore criticising his earlier definition of Volk? It seems unlikely given that in Being and Time the individualism satirized in the chapter on the “they” does not make room for a Volk still determined by the self-identity of the modern subject. The Volk that apprehends itself in its certainty as a self is much more the Volk of National Socialism with its conviction of its oneness and distinctness. Without a comprehension of the essence of subjectivity, the transition from the subject to the Volk, a transition which Heidegger defends in Being and Time and which he believes he later greets in the National Socialist revolution, runs the risk of being frustrated in a reconfiguration of the self. The subjectivity of the subject, and of a people, is the inability to suspect the certainty of the self and to question the givenness of beings, i.e. both their own givenness and that of the beings always already understood to be manipulable.

The subject that can never think past its certainty to an interrogation of the undecidability of the transcendence that “grounds” the subject-object binary is replicated in the “nation” that defines itself by its “nature”, by the positivity into which it was born. Dwelling on the common etymology of “nation” and “nature”, Heidegger implicitly offers a restatement of his own understanding of Volk in the negations of the 1945 dialogue “Evening Conversation between a Younger and an Older Prisoner of War in a Camp in Russia”:

THE ELDER: Nationality is nothing other than the pure subjectivity of a people that refers itself to its “nature” as the real from which all activity proceeds and to which it is to return.

THE YOUNGER: Subjectivity has its essence in the uprising of the human being, the individuals, groups and peoples [Menschentümer] in order to position themselves on themselves and to assert themselves as the ground and measure of the real. With this uprising to subjectivity the uprising to work, as that form of production through which the desolation of the earth is everywhere prepared and destined finally for the illimitable, has its source.⁶³

A nation is here defined by its being subordinate to its own givenness, which is, for it, what is “natural” and thus self-evident. The subjectivity of a nation is this very certainty of itself from which it proceeds to impose itself on all things as their measure. Asserting itself as a self in its presence, and not as a people in its historicity, a nation rises up in work because it is in the spectacle of its own effect in the manipulation of the present-at-hand that the nation assures itself of its own presence. The nation therefore works against itself as a people. It prepares the desolation of the earth by reducing everything to the present-at-hand. Work’s greatest effect is negative and lies in a suppression of the question of Being. A people cannot come to itself in work. In its positivity, a nation is universally recognisable and thus essentially cosmopolitan. Internationalism, for Heidegger, is not the overcoming of nationalism. The nation is international out of its stolidity and torpor with regard to the question of Being; more precisely, the international itself is this stolidity and torpor: “The national and the international are the same”.⁶⁴ In the “Letter on ‘Humanism’” Heidegger similarly writes:

Every nationalism is metaphysically an anthropologism and as such subjectivism. Nationalism is not overcome through mere internationalism, it is rather expanded and elevated thereby into a system.⁶⁵

Presumably internationalism is the systematisation of nationalism because it transforms the anomaly of the single nation into the regularity of nations in the plural. The nation is confirmed in the recognition of other nations and whether it pursues a nationalism of either territorial expansion or “peaceful” economic development is irrelevant in the face of the neglect of the question of Being. Where Heidegger radicalizes the distinction drawn by Humboldt and others during the Wars of Liberation between “Volk” and “Nation”, National Socialism, for all its hostility towards the Latinate, was thwarted by the positivity of its racial conceptions in its attempt to think the “Volk” as anything other than a “Nation”.

In Nietzsche, Heidegger even suggests that National Socialism was much more the consummation of Cartesian metaphysics than a disavowal of French models. Subjectivity, on which the regime imagined it had turned its back through its supposedly anti-liberal immersion in biology, nonetheless informed its racial theories:

Only where the absolute subjectivity of will to power comes to be the truth of beings as a whole is the principle of a program of racial breeding possible; possible, that is, not merely on the basis of continually evolving races, but in terms of the self-conscious thought of race. That is to say, the principle is metaphysically necessary.⁶⁶

The subjectivity that, with Nietzsche, becomes absolute is the sine qua non of eugenics. The absoluteness of this subjectivity is the absoluteness with which it is confronted by the present-at-hand in the final suppression of world. Everything has been submitted to the will to power and become an object to its subject. In the reification that has been carried as far as eugenics, subjectivity witnesses both its triumph as a determining principle of beings and its liquidation as humanity’s distance from the thingly. Eugenics is thus more the science of a Nation than of Heidegger’s Volk. In 1933 a völkische Wissenschaft is, for Heidegger, arguably that politicisation of science by which the reification initiated by classical ontology, and perpetuated by Descartes in the grounding of the metaphysics of subjectivity, would be exposed to the task of destruction.

To repeat: what Heidegger holds against National Socialism is its liberalism. The exceptional character of this objection has frequently entailed its summary dismissal.⁶⁷ In

Adorno's view, for instance, Heidegger never ceased to be a Nazi. And, indeed, on the basis of Heidegger's comments concerning "the inner truth and greatness of this movement", it could be claimed that, in the context of his post-war reticence about the regime, his sole reproach against National Socialism was that it did not live up to expectations. For Heidegger, the NSDAP had turned out to be nothing but Cartesianism for the masses. The movement was too Herderian, which is to say, too Cartesian, to think the notion of the Volk through to the other ontology that would have been the fulfilment of its "folkish" promise. While F. M. Barnard disputes any connection between Herder and National Socialism on the grounds of the former's liberalism⁶⁸, it is in liberalism that the Heidegger of the Contributions to Philosophy discerns the basis for the subordination of science to the "good" of the people. Evading an interrogation of the subjectivity of the subject, National Socialism remained dependent on Herder's own derivative formulation of the "Volkheit der Völker" and can thus be said to have been a monstrous relic of the Enlightenment. The movement did not spring from the sleep of reason but rather from the rationalism that would allow nothing to remain outside its light. At the expense of an understanding of world, it endeavoured to capture the essence of a people in the clarity of presence and thereby in the ontology of the present-at-hand. Certainly a biologicistic conception of humanity cannot be discovered in Herder, yet with his thesis of the equality of peoples, he advances the notion of their commensurability and thus paves the way for the judgement passed upon them in the Nazi hierarchy of races. Herder's liberalism is a cosmopolitanism that sees beyond differences. The equality of peoples that he proposes, in his essay "Von Ähnlichkeit der mittleren englischen und deutschen Dichtkunst", as a principle for historiography, is more than simply contemporaneous with the equality of individuals found in the French Revolution. What the latter constitutes on the national level, Herder's principle constitutes on the global. Herder's open-mindedness toward other peoples, regardless how incompatible it is in many respects with National Socialism, is likewise a repression of what is specific to a people and thus of a people itself. For the sake of commensurability, Herder turns aside from the historicity of a people, and thereby from the inappropriateness of the universal to this historicity.

The essence of a people is, for Herder, its “humanity”. This is evident in his conception of language. In the prize essay “Ueber den Ursprung der Sprache” Herder impoverishes the phenomenon of language to an unadduced common grammar in order to emphasise its planetary unity. The animal rationale is the planetary, and yet worldless, animal: it enunciates its distinctness from all the endemic species through the language that is declared to be only superficially differentiated by climate, terrain, diet and so forth. Herder thus acknowledges the differences between peoples merely so as to stage their disappearance in the ideal of humanity. Language becomes the universal under which the various peoples are subsumed. A people thereby ceases to speak as a people in its finitude and worldliness, because it always speaks away from itself and its historicity to the a-historical generality of its humanity. In rising above its world to its humanity, a people acquires an essence that is its transhistorical recognisability and, with this reformulation in eternity, it forfeits the chance to challenge the understanding of Being as presence and thereby to think its own Being. In contrast to Herder’s language of humanity, Heidegger emphasises a language of the world of a people. In the 1934 lecture course Logic as the Question Concerning the Essence of Language, Heidegger writes of language: “Language is the sway of the world-shaping and preserving centre of the historical Dasein of the people.”⁶⁹ A people speaks as a people by speaking within the thought of its world and it is by this “inhumanity” that it musters the greatest opposition to the liberalism of the Nazi doctrine of race.

“Nazism is a humanism.”⁷⁰ This sentence of Lacoue-Labarthe’s faithfully condenses Heidegger’s account of the movement’s degeneration and disaster. For Heidegger, the master race of National Socialism was defeated by its own liberalism long before this defeat was revived as farce and referred to the overwhelming military, economic and technical superiority of its opponents. The expansionism that was the occasion of this secondary defeat was the regime's grotesque reprise of the ideal of humanity and the commensurability of peoples. The master race became the planetary animal, and its confrontation with other peoples had less to do with the self-questioning of authentic understanding of one another than with the self-confirmation of its positivity. German imperialism had always deliberately set itself apart from the specious altruism of the bearers of civilisation. But the egotism that Wilhelmine Germany expressed in its colonialist watchword "A place in the sun", and to whose exclusive satisfaction the Third Reich consigned the conquered territories, did not distance the German people from the ideal of humanity in any fundamental sense: the people, impossible to ignore in the saturnalia of its gluttony and terror, is not the Volk in Heidegger's formulation, but rather the aggrandised subject of liberalism. The catastrophe of National Socialism, as it is interpreted in Heidegger's writings from the latter years of the regime, was this stillbirth of the people of the question of Being. A people's self-assertion can never be comparable with the self-assertion of the worldlessness of egotism.

If Heidegger's objection to National Socialism is that it was too liberal, then it may seem that he positions himself thereby to the right of the Far Right. The persuasiveness of such an appearance has led to a neglect of the similarities between Heidegger's notion of the Volk and, for instance, Deleuze and Guattari's notion of le peuple à venir and thus to the misapprehension that Heidegger's Volk is of no importance for anything other than a reactionary politics. Indeed Deleuze and Guattari themselves overlook the similarities. In Qu'est-ce que la philosophie? (whose title inevitably recalls the lecture "Was ist das, die Philosophie?" that in August 1955 Heidegger delivered to the colloquium in Cerisy-la-Salle at which Deleuze was a participant⁷¹), Deleuze and Guattari reject Heidegger's Volk in favour of minorities:

He got the wrong people, earth, and blood. For the race summoned forth by art or philosophy is not one that claims to be pure but rather an oppressed, bastard, lower, anarchical, nomadic, and irremediably minor race.⁷²

It must be asked whether Deleuze and Guattari, given their thesis in Anti-Oedipus concerning the fascism of the exclusive disjunction, can allow their notion of a bastard race to stand forth as clearly as this from Heidegger's people. Admitting that "it is not always easy to be Heideggerian"⁷³, Deleuze and Guattari appear, however, to acknowledge the defensive character of their distinction. Heidegger's people, which in the lectures on Hölderlin is summoned forth by poetry, and which, in Being and Time, is defined less by purity than by the impurity of its transcendence in co-historizing, is too unsettling a precursor. And it is unsettling because, in its impurity, it could not keep itself clear even of the people of the most fanatical purity of blood. The transcendence of Heidegger's Volk does not come to a halt before the NSDAP. Rather than confronting the new regime with a simple negation, Heidegger set about effecting a contamination between its notion of the people and his own. In terms of an immediate resistance to National Socialism, this was to do nothing, and whatever persecution Heidegger claims he suffered after resigning the rectorship is unmentionably trivial in comparison with the measures that the regime was all too willing to take against millions of others. The nimbus of philosophical integrity with which Heidegger sought to invest questioning as such is dispelled by the fellow traveller's question of 1933.

Heidegger got it wrong, but, as Deleuze and Guattari concede, it is ultimately not a matter of getting it right or wrong: "Heidegger lost his way along the paths of the reterritorialization because they are paths without directive signs or barriers."⁷⁴

Heidegger's engagement is not excused, but explained, by the lack of models, and that is to say it is negatively explained in this way. Given the arguments against a biologicistic conception of humanity that can be drawn from Heidegger's own writings, his engagement is less to be understood in terms of a subscription to the model of National Socialism, than as a blind spot in the interpretability of his corpus. And if the Heideggerian corpus does not function as an endorsement of National Socialism, the inexcusability of Heidegger's engagement, even in terms of his own thinking, functions to bring forth the inconsistency that prevents Heidegger's thought from congealing into a model. Stupidity, instead of mystery, is what renders this thought indeterminate. The scandal of the rectorship scarcely serves to advertise the lack of models as a model in its turn. Heidegger's self-confessed "greatest stupidity of his life"⁷⁵ is the moment of his greatest failure as a thinker and yet, with this failure, Heidegger's thought attains, as well as falls prey to, the radical questionability that would otherwise have been denied it. The inconsistency between Heidegger's engagement with Nazism and his conception of humanity works against any attribution of coherence to his writings and thus against any claim to decide the sense of a given proposition in these writings by recourse to the coherence of the whole. Wanting to explain Heidegger's engagement, rather than to excuse it, Deleuze and Guattari comment:

How could Heidegger's concepts not be intrinsically sullied by an abject reterritorialization? Unless all concepts include this gray zone and indiscernibility where for a moment the combatants on the ground are confused, and the thinker's tired eye mistakes one thing for the other — not only the German for a Greek but the fascist for a creator of existence and freedom.⁷⁶

For Deleuze and Guattari, the stain of Heidegger's thinking is not so much unique as exemplary of the tiredness to which the thinker succumbs. But what is really explained by this physiological metaphor? Is an inevitability being attributed to Heidegger's engagement with the implicit reference to the inevitability of tiredness? And how does the tiredness that confuses the German and the Greek, the fascist and the creator of existence, differ from the joyful becoming that, for Deleuze and Guattari, is the transitive indeterminacy between polar identities? Interpreting Heidegger's engagement with reference to the inevitability of tiredness, Deleuze and Guattari excuse more than they explain and, by excusing, forego an attempt to explain Heidegger's unsettling consanguinity. Heidegger's people in 1933 is a minority in Deleuze and Guattari's sense, because it does not come to itself. It is a minority because it can find itself neither in the present-at-hand people of a self-assertion of the national nor in the people that finds itself precisely in not finding itself. It is torn between a political and cultural nationalism. To clarify a non-positivistic notion of the people, in explicit contradistinction to the biologicistic Rassenkunde of the regime, can illuminate Heidegger's own notion of the people in 1933 only to the extent that it establishes the terms of its confusion, which is to say, the terms of its transcendence. Within this confusion the minority of the Germans, both political and cultural, is prolonged. In the minority by which it overreaches the present-at-hand, the Volk touches uncannily on the Un-thought of metaphysics: Being is minoritarian.

Was Heidegger's political engagement less an engagement with the self-assertion of the German people in 1933 than with the self-defeating stupidity of this self-assertion? How, if at all, can the two be distinguished? Deleuze and Guattari consider the possibility that Heidegger's abdication before Hitler was still a philosophical move:

A great philosopher actually had to be reterritorialized on Nazism for the strangest commentaries to meet up, sometimes calling his philosophy into question and sometimes absolving it through such complicated and convoluted arguments that we are still in the dark.⁷⁷

Heidegger was reterritorialized on Nazism in the name, as it were, of the ambiguity and impurity of the people. That Deleuze and Guattari speak of Jews, gypsies and blacks in their treatments of the notion of a people, whereas Heidegger speaks of the Germans, ought not to conceal that it is the status of an ontological exception that comparably inspires these treatments. The people is missing whether it is in the works of Kafka and Rocha or in the Germany of Heidegger's National Socialism. In his reflections on minoritarian cinema, Deleuze writes: "The people exist only in the condition of minority, which is why they are missing."⁷⁸ For Deleuze and Guattari, a people is always a minority because it defines itself by its inability to seize control of the State apparatus. It is too volatile to rally itself for the subjectivity of the State, or even that of the republic of letters. This ontological volatility and undecidability is not the defect of a minority, but its essence, since a minority only acquires an identity through the frustrations, failures and deviations of its flight from the majority, either submitting to an alien characterology or fabricating its own in servility to extant models. A people, in Deleuze and Guattari's sense as in Heidegger's, is a rupture of the identifiable.

Heidegger's "error", and its vertiginous ambivalence, was that he sought to effect the rupture at issue here by means of the State. Drawing their definitions of the State and the people from archaeological and ethnological descriptions of the despotic formations of Asia and the nomadic tribes intermittently breaking from them, Deleuze and Guattari shield themselves from a repetition of Heidegger's engagement. For Deleuze and Guattari, the State is fundamentally "capture" and a people is fundamentally "rupture".

In 1934, when any poorly specified opposition to “the Asiatic” could have been understood as an invitation to racism, Heidegger writes of the common enemy and task of the people and the European state:

A state is only inasmuch as it becomes, as it turns into the historical Being of that being which is called a people. The true historical freedom of the peoples of Europe is after all the precondition for the West’s coming once more to itself spiritually-historically and for its taking possession of its fate in the great decision of the earth against the Asiatic.⁷⁹

What is the Asiatic here that it composes a party in the decision of the earth? An answer that fails completely to make sense of the above quotation, but rather shows up its absurdity, is given twenty-five years later in Heidegger’s critique, in “Hölderlin’s Earth and Heaven”, of Valéry’s assessment of the future of Europe:

Immediately after the First World War (1919), Paul Valéry published a letter under the title, “The Crisis of the Spirit”. In it he poses two questions:

This Europe, will it become what it is in reality (en réalité), that is, a small cape of the asiatic continent? Or will this Europe, rather, remain as what it appears to be (ce qu’elle paraît), that is, the precious part of the whole earth, the pearl of the globe, the brain of a spacious body?

Perhaps Europe has already become what it is: a mere cape, yet as such, also the brain of the entire terrestrial body, the brain that manages the technological-industrial, planetary-interstellar calculation.⁸⁰

Valéry distinguishes from Asia a Europe that has assumed the office of planetary brain, whereas, for Heidegger in 1959, it is the assumption of this very office that recovers Europe for Asia. If Europe's position of global dominance belittles it by turning it into an appendage on the Asian continent, it is because an equation of the Asiatic and the hegemonic is implied in Heidegger's text. However problematic this equation may be, it cannot be denied its longstanding mythic function in identifying the philosophical and political space known as Europe: coming to itself in Greece, in its twofold break with Eastern dogmatism and despotism, Europe has, by definition, always already succumbed to the temptation to absolutise its difference from Asia. Querying the absoluteness of this difference in 1959, Heidegger effectively queries whether the Völkerwanderung was anything more than an expedition of Asian colonialism. But, in 1934, it is a matter of securing the absoluteness of the difference. Allegedly at the service of this difference the state becomes the historical Being of a people. Yet the state that relinquishes its dominion over a people in order to become this people itself does not abjure the principle of the "Asiatic", since the struggle against the "Asiatic" is, in the despotism and dogmatism of its exclusive disjunction, a struggle within the "Asiatic" for the determination of the entities of its control. Having to think its ownness other than by the identifiable and controllable, Europe must reassess its stand on the pairing of authenticity and idiocy. Europe, if it is to be Europe, cannot risk becoming more than a phantasm, more than a site of undecidability beyond an unspecifiable river or mountain range. Europe as Europe cannot be defended. But is the absurdity in which the 1959 text reveals the text of 1934 not one of those absolutions that Deleuze and Guattari believe traverse Heidegger's political engagement? Is it in the very absurdity of the struggle against the "Asiatic" to which Heidegger rallies the peoples of Europe that Europe as such unfolds its absolute difference from despotism? Everything becomes grey in the abyss of stupidity.

Heidegger's hymns to the National Socialist state are too crass in comparison with his thinking as a whole for these texts not to arouse the suspicion that here the state is the object of a sombre, ignominious humour. In a speech delivered in August 1934, and thus after the resignation of the rectorship of Freiburg University, Heidegger appears to "forget" his authorship of Being and Time:

The essence of the National Socialist revolution consists in the fact that Adolf Hitler has elevated that new spirit of the community to being the formative power of a new configuration of the people. The National Socialist revolution is thus not the superficial appropriation of the power of a state already in place by a party grown equal to the task but rather the inner re-education of the entire people towards the goal of wanting its own unity and oneness. Inasmuch as the people wills its own vocation, it recognizes the new state. The rule of this state is the responsible implementation of that commanding will to which the dedicated trust of the people empowers the leadership. The state is not a mechanical apparatus of law alongside the institutions of the economy, art, science and religion. On the contrary, the state signifies the living configuration pervaded by alternate trust and responsibility in which and through which the people realises its own historical Dasein.⁸¹

Can a people, as authentic Being-with-one-another, want, without contradiction, its own unity and oneness? What could be the ontological basis for the unity and oneness of a people? Heidegger's address makes no pretensions to an existential analytic: the people simply wills its own oneness.⁸² Recognition of the state follows upon this manipulated caprice of the people, and the metaphysics of subjectivity in the cast of the people's oneness is perpetuated. Those relations between a people and its sovereign that Hobbes sees as a response to the violence of the state of nature, are here, for Heidegger, the consequence of a bluntly posited education and will. Indeed, Heidegger's address reads as a pastiche of Hobbes. The people whose unity Hobbes in Leviathan sees represented in the corporeal singleness of its sovereign⁸³, and whose acceptance of a sovereign defines it in De Cive in distinction from a multitude⁸⁴, is shadowed by a people for whom the realities of the English Civil War have been replaced by the tabula rasa of nihilistic voluntarism. Having dispensed with the externality of circumstances, and thus with the measure that they constitute in Hobbes, Heidegger, in 1933, is able to say of Hitler: "The Führer himself and alone is the present and future German reality and its law."⁸⁵ This proposition with its unqualified abasement before despotism, like the critique of Valéry in 1959, declares the complete bankruptcy of the myth of Europe. Heidegger's obeisance to Hitler marks the death of philosophy because it reverses the substitution of another ground than that of authority by which Hegel, for one, and with explicit awareness of the conventionality of the definition, defines philosophy in his lectures on its history.⁸⁶ This reversal is in itself the death of Europe. The death of philosophy, of that which, in his What is Philosophy?, Heidegger says it is a tautology to call "Western"⁸⁷, is nonetheless what the necessarily phantasmic character of philosophy presupposes. The Europe that dies in 1933 is the Europe that, in the substantiality of its absolute difference from Asia, never existed as other than an Asian peninsula. Foundational to the identity of that which has escaped the despotic, the myth of Europe would only itself be European if it forewent the capture and determination proper to the “Asiatic”. The struggle against the “Asiatic” thus entails a struggle against the myth of Europe and where Heidegger rallies the European states against the “Asiatic”, and at the same time preaches unquestioning submission to Hitler, it is the myth of Europe that yields. Heidegger, accordingly, makes of the state a means to rupture the identity of Europe.

What must, but cannot, be rescued in Heidegger’s abasement before Hitler is this rupture. The intoxicated and unreserved acquiescence to dictatorship is inseparable from the suspicion of the contradictory reterritorialisation of European identity and yet cannot be vindicated by it. And that it cannot be vindicated by it is because this acquiescence raises the question as such, as the proper-improper site of Europe’s difference from dogmatism, first of all against itself. Heidegger’s people is, and is not, the people of National Socialism. It is the people of National Socialism because it is the people that National Socialism courted through its promise to break with the despotism of the cosmopolitan and the universal. And it is not the people of National Socialism because this promise was reneged. The distance of Heidegger’s Volk from the movement as well as its insuperable proximity lies in its ideality for the movement. The people that National Socialism courted as the self-assertion of the European essence is, in its truth as the question as such, the critical destruction of the Hitlerian dictatorship. This people always escapes despotism because as the phenomenon of world it is never simply a determinate being for manipulation and control. Heidegger’s acquiescence to National Socialism was thus an acquiescence to a despotism grounding itself in the people of its own impossibility. The ambivalence of Heidegger’s engagement is the ambivalence of National Socialism itself. What for Heidegger, in 1953, has not ceased to constitute the inner truth and greatness of the movement is the latter’s own impossibility, since it is the same impossibility by which the manipulation of beings in technicism is confronted with its limitations and brought to a recollection of Being. If not National Socialism, so much as its impossibility, is what is equal to the encounter with τεχνη, then Heidegger's following remark from the interview with Der Spiegel is not a retraction of his clarificatory parenthesis in An Introduction to Metaphysics:

A decisive question for me today is: how can a political system accommodate itself to the technological age, and which political system would this be? I have no answer to this question. I am not convinced that it is democracy.⁸⁸

Democracy here is not being denied as an option alongside other political systems — as though in the past Heidegger was convinced of the adequacy to the technical age of a given political system. Arguably, for Heidegger, National Socialism was not one political system among others. The undecidable excess of his engagement lies in its being an engagement with the political per se. It is the Volk in its irreducibility to reification, rather than any one political system, that is equal to the encounter with τεχνη. To the extent that a political system gives itself up to its differentiation from other political systems and thereby neglects the essential indeterminacy of the people, to that extent it is unequal to this encounter. Consumed with their differences from one another, liberalism and despotism are fundamentally the same in their neglect of the people. Heidegger's rejection of democracy is inextricable from his attempt to think the people as such. Democracy, which for Kant is an oxymoron⁸⁹, is for Heidegger a debasement of the people's transcendent finitude, a debasement that reduces it to the universal by which a people exerts authority over, and in spite of, the political domain.

I The Death of Hegel

When Heidegger in §74 of Being and Time introduces the word “Volk”, it is in the course of an exposition of the essential historicity of Dasein. This historicity, as he claims in the same section, has its ground in finitude: “Authentic Being-towards-death — that is to say, the finitude of temporality — is the hidden basis of Dasein’s historicity.”¹ Here Dasein is said to be historical, not because of any participation in the events of a people’s public life, but rather because of its finitude. In its authentic Being-towards-death, Dasein is already historical and thus, for Heidegger, already the historizing of the Volk. Situating the ground of historicity in finitude, and mentioning the Volk only to define its historizing by the destiny of Dasein, Heidegger aligns the people with the question of death. The people can rise up as a people only in and for its finitude; it does not face its death in order to overcome it, but on the contrary to run towards it and to think the temporality of this anticipation and of the Being thereby revealed as its own in its irreducibility to presence.

From Being and Time Heidegger took into his engagement with National Socialism a grotesquely sophisticated receptiveness to its initially rhetorical calls for self-sacrifice. And he did so not out of simple ingenuousness. Having brought all his perspicacity to bear on the confrontation with Hegel over the question of death, Heidegger conceived a response to Hegel that is not a response to National Socialism. The task of an Auseinandersetzung with Hegel, announced in the final sentence of his postdoctoral dissertation², in the earliest extant notes of one of his lecture courses³, and then addressed throughout his entire corpus, did not prevent Heidegger from ostensibly emulating his “great adversary”⁴ in making his way to the State. In this respect, Heidegger's reaction to Hegel could not be more different from either Marx's or Nietzsche's. Without ever elaborating a philosophy of the State, Heidegger will have become a State thinker. But a State thinker in what sense? Referring to 30 January 1933, the date of Hitler's installation in power, Carl Schmitt writes: "On this day therefore one can say that 'Hegel died'."⁵ Yet where Schmitt merely wanted to note the politicisation of the German bureaucracy, it is arguable that, for Heidegger, the National Socialist revolution signified much more than the abandonment of one facet of the Philosophy of Right. Hegel's "death", as the determinative negativity of the logic of Absolute Spirit, was itself to die in yielding to the State of the people of finitude.

In order to ascertain the philosophical foundations of the understanding of the State in Heidegger's engagement with National Socialism, it is necessary to review Heidegger's objection to Hegel's assimilation of death and human finitude to an ultimately still conventional logic. As a result of this assimilation, the Hegelian State remains indifferent to the essence of Dasein. The famous passage on death from the Preface to the Phenomenology of Spirit reads:

The activity of dissolution is the power and work of the Understanding, the most astonishing and mightiest of powers, or rather the absolute power. The circle that remains self-enclosed and, like substance, holds its moments together, is an immediate relationship, one therefore which has nothing astonishing about it. But that an accident as such, detached from what circumscribes it, what is bound and is actual only in its context with others, should attain an existence of its own and a separate freedom — this is the tremendous power of the negative; it is the energy of thought, of the pure 'I'. Death, if that is what we want to call this non-actuality, is of all things the most dreadful, and to hold fast what is dead requires the greatest strength. Lacking strength, Beauty hates the Understanding for asking of her what she cannot do. But the life of Spirit is not the life that shrinks from death and keeps itself untouched by devastation, but rather the life that endures it and maintains itself in it. It wins its truth only when, in utter dismemberment, it finds itself. It is this power, not as something positive, which closes its eyes to the negative, as when we say of something that it is nothing or is false, and then, having done with it, turn away and pass on to something else; on the contrary, Spirit is this power only by looking the negative in the face, and tarrying with it. This tarrying with the negative is the magical power that converts it into being. This power is identical with what we earlier called the Subject, which by giving determinateness an existence in its own element supersedes abstract immediacy, i.e. the immediacy which barely is, and thus is authentic substance: that being or immediacy whose mediation is not outside of it but which is this mediation itself.⁶

Death, for Hegel, is simply another name for the negative. Hegel does not spell out why death should be simply another name for the negative; he does not press the synonymy, but rather admits, in a subordinate clause, to its arbitrariness ("if that is what we want to call this non-actuality"). And yet this arbitrariness is far from denoting a relaxation in the philosophical rigour of Hegel's text. Hegel imposes a sense on death only after death has been stripped of meaning by the very starting point of the Phenomenology of Spirit. Hegel's pure ego, whose experience of its own consciousness is set forth in this work, cannot die because it is nothing other than Thought. In the above passage, Hegel clarifies almost at once that the purity of this ego is not the distance at which the life of the Spirit preserves itself from devastation. Death, in such a case, would retain its meaning for the pure ego in the form of a threat and a determinative opposite. Death cannot menace the ego that, as the thinkability of the thinkable, is the thought, and hence the rationality and sublation, of its own death. What in death is unthinkable is, for Hegel, merely a hypochondriac's fancy and the consequence of a refusal to think death. In its thinkability, death is not the extrinsic limit of thought, but rather one of its moments. It is identified with thought's own power of delimitation and hence with that which Hegel calls the Understanding. Hegel's pure ego cannot die because it is already death itself, and it is thus as already torn apart that it finds itself. The pure ego comes to itself only in and as the limits along which the positive is sundered into individual entities. According to Hegel, the pure ego is not so much finite as finitude, since it is the negation by which all other entities are contained. As the finitude of what is, the Hegelian pure ego is the subject in both its ancient and modern senses. It is the subject that, as Aristotle's substance, stands outside determination and gives existence to the determinate, and it is the subject that, as thought, stands outside determination only because it is itself the power of determination. In the Phenomenology of Spirit, Being is already Nothing since the existence (i.e. the Kantian irreducibility of what is to a set of determinations) that the subject bestows is the non-positivity of the determining negation. Hegel thus grasps the difference of Being from beings in the differentiation effected by negativity — thus in Spinoza's equation of determination and negation. With a provocative similarity to the thesis of Being and Time, the truth of the Being that Aristotle thinks as substance is seen to lie in finitude.

In response to Hegel's definition of the "I" as not merely finite but as finitude itself, Heidegger will ask whether, in this apotheosis of finitude, the genuine question of death is notwithstanding neglected. Heidegger's exposition of death is informed by the question of Being. The polemic against Hegel enunciated in this treatment is hence trivialised if it is formulated as the opposition of a realist's account of death to a logician's account. Heidegger does not restore death as a possibility of the "I" simply out of fidelity to appearances. Indeed, adequacy cannot be the criterion because adequacy itself must first be grounded. And it is precisely such a grounding of the correspondence between an account and its object that Heidegger attempts in his analysis of the being-outside-of-itself of Dasein's Being-towards-death. The traditional understanding of truth as adequation is made an affair of the transcendence of Dasein. When Heidegger reproaches Hegel's presentation of death with a lack of seriousness, he is therefore not suggesting that Hegel's death is a simulacrum:

Negativity as dismemberment and division is "death" — the absolute Lord; and "life of absolute Spirit" means nothing other than to bear death and see it through. (But with this "death" it can never become serious; no καταστροφή possible, no fall and overthrow possible; everything offset and evened out. Everything is already unconditionally secured and accommodated.)⁷

Hegel's death is never in earnest, not because it is a counterfeit of death, but because it is not a catastrophe. The seriousness of death is, for Heidegger, its character as catastrophe. But a catastrophe for whom? Hegel's death is not a catastrophe and cannot overthrow the pure ego, since it has always already been appropriated and reconciled. The pure ego is, by definition, that which cannot be overthrown. In its position of power over everything that is, the pure ego is not subject to any external fate. It is in no instance simply the patient of a verb. Desiring a catastrophe that is an event and not the element in which Spirit finds itself in being torn apart, Heidegger conceives the human being as patient, rather than as agent. In contrast to the permanent and thus feigned catastrophe of the death that is the self-certainty of the pure ego, Dasein is that which can suffer death as an event, and hence in its seriousness as downfall. Heidegger even makes of this possibility of suffering death the distinguishing mark of Dasein and, by the terms of the understanding of the human in Hegel's philosophy, he thereby dehumanises Dasein.

For Hegel, it is Nature alone that can die and it must die in order for Spirit to realise itself. In the Zusatz to §376 of the Encyclopaedia, Hegel writes:

The goal of Nature is to destroy itself and to break through its husk of immediate, sensuous existence, to consume itself like the phoenix in order to come forth from this externality rejuvenated as spirit.⁸

Death is accordingly the event that befalls that which is not yet Spirit. In §375 Hegel portrays death as the inevitable lot of the animal:

The universality which makes the animal, as a singular, a finite existence, reveals itself in it as the abstract power which terminates the internal process active within the animal, a process which is itself abstract. The disparity between its finitude and universality is its original disease and the inborn germ of death, and the removal of this disparity is itself the accomplishment of this destiny.⁹

The animal thus dies because in its inadequacy to the universal it is able to die. Given that death has always already been overtaken by the self-consciousness of Spirit in which Hegel sees the essence of the human, when a human being dies it is therefore never as a human being: in the Zusatz to the preceding section, Hegel speaks of the physiological aspects of old age as a return to a simply vegetative life.¹⁰ In its adequacy to the universal, the human being is relieved of his or her mortality, which is to say, of a susceptibility to catastrophe. Nothing can ever happen purely to it, and it must therefore extract from itself its understanding of time. Time, for Hegel, takes its definition from Spirit. It is nothing other than Spirit's partial comprehension of itself. Insisting on death as an essential possibility of Dasein and denouncing the assimilation of catastrophe as simply a means to have done with the question of mortality, Heidegger seeks to contest the sublation of time in the immanent movement of the concept. Heidegger's account of the human being as an entity delivered up defenceless to its own mortality is not dictated by pessimism or decadence. What is at stake for Heidegger is neither brute "fact" nor an aesthetic, but rather a critique of metaphysics on the foundation of a more originary understanding of time. Dasein must die, so that with its very frailty it might wrest the question of Being from the deficient seriousness of the logic of what is only ever present.

Heidegger's exposition of the catastrophic character of death cannot be comprehended apart from Hegel's exposition of the conceptuality, and hence ultimate stasis, of time. On the strength of this exposition, of the panlogism that has reappropriated the non-conceptuality of Kant's a priori intuitions, Hegel is able to assert that finitude is, in truth, Spirit. Heidegger will not challenge this assertion merely to reinstate time in its Kantian complementarity to the conceptual. It is Spirit itself in its self-presence that is to be interrogated, for in raising time to the concept Hegel reduces it to presence. In the Zusatz to §258 of the Encyclopaedia Hegel asserts:

But in its Notion [Begriff], time itself is eternal; for time as such — not any particular time, nor Now — is its Notion, and this, like every Notion generally, is eternal, and therefore also absolute Presence. Eternity will not come to be, nor was it, but it is. The difference therefore between eternity and duration is that the latter is only a relative sublation of time, whereas eternity is infinite, i.e. not relative, duration but duration reflected into itself.¹¹

For Hegel, the concept (Begriff) of time cannot, as a concept, be other than eternal. By conceptualising time, Hegel does not dispute the eternity of the presence that Plato attributes to the Ideas. And yet the time in which concepts demonstrate their eternity through the subsumption of temporally divergent and finite particulars has always had to be distinct from eternity. Were the time in which concepts distinguish themselves from the transient itself the eternal and absolute present, then the distinction, and the proof of the eternity of concepts, would be impossible. In what way therefore can the concept of time amount to the truth of time?

Given his panlogism and his axiom of the ubiquity of the concept, a proof of the eternity of concepts is something with which Hegel can dispense. It is clear that, for Hegel, what is paramount in his exposition of time and space is the revelation of the infinity of Spirit. Space will give way to time, and time will give way to the concept that is Spirit. In §254, Hegel sets forth the nature of space in such a way that his ultimate goal is unmistakable:

The first or immediate determination of Nature is Space: the abstract universality of Nature's self-externality, self-externality's mediationless indifference. It is a wholly ideal side-by-sideness because it is self-externality; and it is absolutely continuous, because this asunderness is still quite abstract, and contains no specific difference within itself.¹²

Nature, which is not yet Spirit, and which is thus not yet self-reflection, is that which is outside itself. At its greatest remove from Spirit, Nature is this being-outside-of-itself in its barest abstraction as the punctuality of space. And space is outside itself without thereby creating a difference within itself, since such a difference would be contrary to its abstraction from all determinations. Where Spirit, as the negativity of what is, is limitation, space is continuum. Between these parameters Hegel means to encompass the Whole in all the wealth of its articulations. In this his success has never really been doubted, because it is the determinable as such and alone that Hegel brings to thought. Space in its abstractness waits for nothing other than to be determined and, indeed, it cannot but be determined. Hegel's space is not so far removed from Spirit that it escapes the reach of the latter's power of determination. In its determinate indeterminacy, Hegel's space is already a continuum. That which does not stand fast, and does not appear in any determinacy, does not appear at all.

Hegel's conception of the indeterminate is that which, standing fast in the light of presence, is consistent even before being determined. For Hegel, time is the truth of the continuity of space rather than the occasion for a question concerning the presence in which all beings stand fast.

In §258, Hegel interprets time as the negative unity of the being-outside-of-itself that he earlier names "space":

Time, as the negative unity of self-externality, is similarly an out-and-out abstract, ideal being. It is that being which, inasmuch as it is, is not, and inasmuch as it is not, is: it is Becoming directly intuited; this means that differences, which admittedly are purely momentary, i.e. directly self-sublating, are determined as external, i.e. as external to themselves.¹³

Time is the unity, and hence fundamental homogeneity, of space. It is a negative unity because it is through the negation of the disunity of being-outside-of-itself that space attains to its unity. Time is not a negative unity in the sense that it is a disruption of unity. On the contrary, time is the negativity in which being outside itself is for itself, and it is nothing other than this negativity. Time, for Hegel, is able to be the truth of space because it is characterised equally by the punctuality in which space is a being-outside-of-itself. Time is the being-outside-of-itself in which the indifference between one point and another in space becomes the negativity by which the points are related one to the other in an albeit abstract unity.

The point, which Hegel in §254 designates a being-for-itself and the negation of space, is negated in its negativity by time. On this first step towards the absolute negativity of Spirit, Heidegger comments in Being and Time:

When punctuality as indifference gets transmuted, this signifies that it no longer remains lying in the 'paralysed tranquillity of space'. The point 'gives itself airs' [»spreizt sich auf«, or spreads itself apart] before all the other points. According to Hegel, this negation of the negation as punctuality is time. If this discussion has any demonstrable meaning, it can mean nothing else than that the positing-of-itself-for-itself of every point is a "now-here", "now-here", and so on.¹⁴

The now-sequence that Heidegger feels obliged to discover in Hegel's interpretation of time becomes the basis for a reproach:

No detailed discussion is needed to make plain that in Hegel's Interpretation of time he is moving wholly in the direction of the way time is ordinarily understood. When he characterizes time in terms of the "now", this presupposes that in its full structure the "now" remains levelled off and covered up, so that it can be intuited as something present-at-hand, though present-at-hand only 'ideally'.¹⁵

But is the negation of the punctuality of space in time overlooked in this reading?

How can Heidegger attribute to Hegel the vulgar understanding of time, in which one discrete moment follows inexplicably on another, if this indifferent punctuality is precisely what Hegel negates in his account of time? In her essay, “The dialogue between Heidegger and Hegel”, Denise Souche-Dagues takes issue with what she considers to be “the blindness of Heidegger towards the real meaning of Hegel’s texts”.¹⁶ And yet, as obvious as it is that Hegel’s account of time differs from the vulgar understanding that Heidegger criticises, it is not at all clear that, in the violence of his exegesis, Heidegger has missed Hegel’s real meaning. Hegel’s time negates the indifferent punctuality of the vulgar understanding of time only to remain itself present-at-hand in its ideality. Thus, Souche-Dagues unwittingly argues for Heidegger’s reading when she writes:

Furthermore, there is nothing like a ‘fall’ of Spirit into time, which would mean that Spirit descends from an eternity situated out of time. Eternity is for Hegel in its immanent totalization which is its true infinity. The present (Gegenwart) which is responsible for presenting this absolute unification indicates clearly that time is not in truth the indefinite and formal series of here-nows, cancelling themselves in the etc., etc., of indefiniteness.¹⁷

Time in Hegel is eternal neither outside of time nor within time, but, on the contrary, as time. It is time as the totality of all periods of time, and thus as the concept of time, that is present for Hegel and is present because there can be no period of time outside its unity in which it would not be present. The vulgar understanding of time is thus manifest in Hegel’s “elevation” of time to the concept. Time in the eternity of its concept is that which is present, and hence, although punctuality is negated in Hegel's account of temporality, the vulgar understanding of time remains determinative through the privileging of the present.

Even in its "elevation" to the concept, time constitutes a fall for the Hegelian Spirit. It is in this sense that Heidegger speaks of a fall of Spirit into time (Souche-Dagues's rejected descent from an eternity situated outside of time is simply irrelevant to Heidegger's text). Quoting Hegel himself from the concluding chapter of the Phenomenology of Spirit, Heidegger writes:

Because the restlessness with which spirit develops in bringing itself to its concept is the negation of a negation, it accords with spirit, as it actualizes itself, to fall 'into time' as the immediate negation of a negation. For 'time is the concept itself, which is there [da ist] and which represents itself to the consciousness as an empty intuition; because of this, spirit necessarily appears in time, and it appears in time as long as it does not grasp its pure concept — that is, as long as time is not annulled by it. Time is the pure Self-external, intuited, not grasped by the Self — the concept which is merely intuited.'¹⁸

Time is the concept, i.e. that which mediates, in its immediacy. It is therefore a contradiction. Time is Spirit that has fallen away from itself, because it is that negation of a negation which is nonetheless not reflective. It apes Spirit in its self-presence: it is the mediating negation that is external to itself as mediation. Negating the negativity of the point, time "finds" itself in the becoming that is, inasmuch as it is not, and is not, inasmuch as it is. And "finding" itself in the negativity of becoming, time already shares the infinite finitude in which Spirit is present to itself.

The absolute presence of time — its negative unity over the punctuality of being-outside-of-itself — is, as the term indicates, a formulation of temporality from which transcendence has been shorn. Hegel's interpretation of time remains modelled on the discrete "now" and the vulgar understanding of time is perpetuated.

The concept is able to become, for Hegel, the truth of time, because the legitimacy of unity, on which the concept relies, is not allowed to be challenged by an exposition of the essential ecstasy of time.¹⁹ The transitions that negativity effects from one point to the other are not thought through to an interrogation of the unity of any concept of time — of that which Heidegger, in his 1924 lecture "The Concept of Time", calls meaningless.²⁰

Addressing time's place between the finite and the concept, Hegel states in the Remark to §258 of the Encyclopaedia:

The finite is perishable and temporal because, unlike the Notion, it is not in its own self total negativity; true, this negativity is immanent in it as its universal essence, but the finite is not adequate to this essence: it is one-sided, and consequently it is related to negativity as to the power that dominates it. The Notion, however, in its freely self-existent identity as $I = I$, is in and for itself absolute negativity and freedom. Time, therefore, has no power over the Notion, nor is the Notion in time or temporal; on the contrary, it is the power over time, which is this negativity only qua externality.²¹

Accordingly, Spirit, for Hegel, indeed falls away from itself into time, but in the sense of a fall from the concept to the externality of "intuition" rather than from an eternity outside of time. The absolute distance that Kant opened between the a priori intuition of time and the concept is reformulated as simply an obstacle on the path of Spirit's self-realisation. Whereas, in the above passage, the finite is said to lie in the power of time because of its inadequacy to its concept, time, for its part, lies in the power of the concept because of its inadequacy to its own negativity. Having defined time by the negation of the indifferent externality of being-outside-of-itself, Hegel is able to recover time for the concept on the basis of a consanguinity: time, as the negation of the externality of punctuality, and hence as an external negation, is not yet the absolute negativity in which the pure ego is the determination of what is. Through defining time by negation and the concept by determinative negativity, Hegel brings together what Kant had held apart. The ostensible radicality of Hegel's abandonment of the definition of the concept as the universal of finite particulars is thus ultimately conservative, since it is intended to stifle the question intimated by Kant in his treatment of the extra-conceptuality of time. What Kant had wrested from the sway of dogmatic metaphysics, Hegel returns. The Kantian affirmation of finitude is followed by a restoration of the concept. The Hegelian concept is installed as the power of time, and the eternal present reasserts itself over the transcendence of finitude. The Aristotelian One is secured against any suspicion of its propriety and primacy. Hegel's time stands guarantor for the foundations of traditional logic, because it underwrites, through its presence, the intelligibility of whatever is. That which falls under the power of time is accordingly never able to make of its finitude an affront to the unity in which time itself is collected in its negativity in the absolute present of Spirit.

In his 1930-1 lecture course, Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit, Heidegger reiterates his conception of the Auseinandersetzung with Hegel on the issue of finitude:

But one may ask whether setting up a confrontation with Hegel like this is not superfluous. Was it not Hegel, in fact, who ousted finitude from philosophy in the sense that he sublated it or overcame it by putting it in its proper place? Certainly. But the question is whether the finitude that was determinant in philosophy before Hegel was the original and effective finitude installed in philosophy, or whether it was only an incidental finitude that philosophy was constrained to take up and transmit. The question must be asked whether Hegel's conception of infinitude did not arise from that incidental finitude, in order to reach back and absorb it.

The question is whether finitude, as the innermost distress at the heart of the matter in question, determines the necessity of questioning. If not, then the confrontation with Hegel is not in opposition to him, in the form of a defense of the finitude which he has surmounted, but is concerned rather with what he has surmounted and the way in which he did so.²²

Hegel evades the problem of finitude by grasping finitude in its essence, since he grasps it in that by which, as a concept, it is already infinite. He therefore surmounts that which cannot even emerge as a problem for the conceptualism, and that is to say eternalism, of metaphysics. Heidegger's preoccupation with finitude does not entail fixing upon temporality in Hegel prior to its sublation in Spirit. The temporality in which Spirit misapprehends itself is by no means the temporality in which the self-presence of Spirit is rendered genuinely questionable. Spirit errs in time without ever straying from the path to its self-realisation. It cannot truly err in time because time itself does not err for Hegel. Time's inadequacy to the self-presence of Spirit is not ascribed to the ecstases of originary temporality, but rather to the partiality of time's negativity with respect to the Absolute. The failure of adequation is situated in a falling short within presence and not in an overreaching of presence. Hegel's time does not transcend the One. Time, for Hegel, is the unity whose deficiency is not to know itself as unity. It is a subordinate element that testifies to the unity of the self-knowledge of the Absolute even in the obstinacy of its error.

For Hegel in his predestinarianism, every error corrects itself in advance and every distress is always already assuaged. By holding to the distress and privation (Not) of finitude explicitly as transcendence, Heidegger prosecutes a critique of the unitary. Here the confession of lack is not a confession of servility. On the contrary, it stems from an ambition to think Being as such and not merely Being as presence. However much Heidegger's "Not" recalls Christian disquisitions on the indigence of humanity, it cannot be said to be theological, since Heidegger is not concerned with inculcating an awareness of a dependence on God. It is dependence pure and simple that is at stake, and that, in its lack of the contentment and self-containment of presence, is being opposed to traditional ontology. The neediness in Heidegger's conception of humanity is far less an affliction imposed by an external power, than it is the ecstatic essence of the being that he defines by originary temporality. Heidegger thus defends a finitude that has not been surmounted by Hegel because it was never admitted, and could not be admitted without a fundamental interrogation of logic.

In the same 1930-1 lecture course on Hegel, Heidegger suggests that it is not a case of a mere revision and reform of logic:

With respect to the title “Being and Time,” one could speak of an ontochrony. Here χρόνος stands in the place of λόγος. But were both of these only interchanged? No. On the contrary, what matters is to unfold everything anew from the ground up, by taking over the essential motive of the question of being. It is important to show — formulating it with Hegel — that it is not the concept which is “the power of time,” but it is time which is the power of the concept.²³

“Here χρόνος stands in the place of λόγος.” The gathering together in the One of the λόγος, by which the entire history of the metaphysical treatment of the question of Being has been governed, is contrasted with the unrecuperated being-outside-of-itself of χρόνος. Hegel’s infinitude, which pretends to be a sublation of finitude, overcomes limits only to be arrested in its transgression, assuming the shape of delimitation itself. The uprising against finitude will have left the structuration of the real intact. Spirit’s insurrection against theology will not pass beyond its own investiture as the One that lets each and every entity be seen in its determinate unity. Is Heidegger, through identifying the λόγος in Being and Time with “a letting-something-be-seen”²⁴, therefore proposing χρόνος as its antithesis, as a letting-nothing-be-seen? Heidegger warns against reading the substitution mechanically. The nothing that χρόνος lets be “seen” is not an entity that withholds itself from apprehension in a moment that is no longer or not yet now, that remains distinguishable in the peculiarity of its comportment and hence still subject to the One. What χρόνος lets be “seen” is the indeterminacy that is the originary dissolution of the stable identities of what is only ever apprehended in the derivative temporality of presence. Time is the “power”, i.e. the condition of possibility of the concept, inasmuch as it is within time and an inadequate understanding of time that the concept — the Hegelian λόγος that is self-comprehending Spirit — is able to assert itself in its presence as the Being of beings. Hegel’s Spirit is the Being of beings in the Greek sense of their visibility and determinacy, which is to say their presentability.

Moreover, that the Being of beings is identified with nothingness in the Logic does not involve a questioning of the understanding of Being as presence, since it is nothingness in the sense of determinative negativity that is for Hegel the very ground of the presentability of what is. Distinguishing the identity of Being and nothingness in “What is Metaphysics?” from their identity in Hegel, Heidegger writes in the Contributions to Philosophy:

When the sentence from Hegel’s Logic is quoted in “What is Metaphysics?” — ‘Being and nothing are the same’ — that means, and can only mean, an analogue for bringing together Being and nothing as such. However, for Hegel “Being” [Seyn] is exactly not only a certain first stage of what in the future is to be thought as Being [Seyn], but this first stage is, as the un-determined, un-mediated stage precisely already pure negativity of objectness and of thinking (beingness and thinking).²⁵

Hegel's nothingness is no more than the negation of determinacy that determinacy as such already is. Nothingness is already a moment in whatever is, inasmuch as every being is determinate, for Hegel, in some way or another. In such an understanding of nothingness, time's difference from the visibility of the present-at-hand — its nothingness — is not thought beyond the presence in which beings are present and hence conceptualisable. The invisibility of time thereby ceases to be the occasion for a question of the primacy of the concept. Dasein, as the being that is essentially wedded to its finitude, cannot but be misunderstood by Hegel and subordinated to the concept. Plato's depreciative interpretation of finitude as $\mu\eta\ \text{ov}$ remains determinative. Solely from the vantage point of the concept and the unthinkability of the unpresentable is the finitude of the being that has not overcome $\chi\rho\nu\nu\sigma$ to find itself in the eternity of the concept the condition of inadequacy to its own conceptual determination. From the vantage point of $\chi\rho\nu\nu\sigma$, this conceptual inadequacy is, however, the "adequacy" to the more originary power of the indetermination of time.

With the exposition of the primacy of finitude, Heidegger stands the metaphysical notion of the freedom of the philosopher on its head. Freedom no longer lies in the concept and slavery no longer lies in finitude. What for an "ontochrony" accordingly turns out to be subaltern is not that which is finite but the power of limitation itself, since it is the latter that has not passed to an identity with the highest power. What has risen to become the $\lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\varsigma$ has not become independent of time. As the power that is the unity of that which is, the $\lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\varsigma$ falls short of the non-unity that is ecstatic temporality and remains subordinate to it. Preserving its metaphysical cast, the freedom toward which the Hegelian philosophy directs itself, and in which it is to be a sublation of finitude, is an identification with the determinacy of what is.

It is this interpenetration of positivism and infinitude that informs Hegel's political thinking. It also informs the notorious sentence from the Preface to the Philosophy of Right: "What is rational is actual and what is actual is rational."²⁶ Certainly other passages in the work make it clear that Hegel is not rejecting all possible alterations to the status quo as irrational, but the sentence can notwithstanding be considered positivistic in its aligning of the determinate with the thinkable. Hegel's political positivism has nothing to do with a naïvety in the face of the "facts" and everything to do with a panlogism and the suppression of the extra-conceptual. Through surmounting finitude, Hegel cannot but arrive in paradise, and yet, as he nonetheless cannot disguise from himself that he has become an official of the Prussian State, he has no choice other than to take on the role of its apologist. Hegel's Philosophy of Right is marked by gullibility only to the extent that it is marked by wisdom. Cancelling out the distance from the truth of what is, Hegel has made his way to the σοφία to which the philosopher merely aspired. He has become, in Kojève's words, the Wise Man. Nothing is alien to him (i.e. to his reformulation of traditional logic). The Prussian State assumes ineluctably the aspect of the concrete universal, and the bureaucracy is revealed as the mediation between the particulars of the corporations. Where Socrates in the Phaedo awaits wisdom after death, Hegel is already death itself and thus already wise. The former flees the State through death; the latter becomes the State through death. The infinite and determinative negativity of Hegel's death reveals more than a mere kinship with the State's immanent organisation of the social body. Whatever is not fundamentally at one with Spirit would amount to an objection against Hegel's claim to wisdom.

If Hegel's passage to the State is through in-finitude, Heidegger's is through finitude. The death that Heidegger defers and thinks as an event opens a space for a critique of the One of metaphysics, but it did not prevent his abasement before Hitler. Drawing back from the wisdom that ushered Hegel into the service of the State, Heidegger exempted himself, through the reserve and emphatic φιλία of his philosophy, from a repetition of Hegel's panegyrics. He did not extol the State whose essence is realised in logic, yet he nonetheless proceeded to a State with little interest in a conception of humanity at odds with the present-at-hand. The human being that, as an individual in the logical sense, admits of sublation in the universal of the Prussian State, will have simply been replaced by the specimen of biological material. In both cases, beings remained determined in their discreteness and identifiability by the metaphysics of presence.

Heidegger's conception of the National Socialist State cannot however simply be read off from the historiographically verifiable reality of the regime without a neglect of his condemnation of biologism. A surer indication of the basis of Heidegger's conception of the Nazi State is a passage in the 1934-5 lecture course Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein". In a reflection on the possibility of community, it juxtaposes Heidegger's own treatment of Being-towards-death with the nationalist idealisation of the soldier at the front:

The camaraderie of the soldiers at the front has its foundation neither in the fact that they had to get along because others who were far away were missing nor for that matter in the circumstance that they met up through a shared enthusiasm. On the contrary, its foundation lies solely and at its deepest therein that before all else the proximity of death as a sacrifice placed them all in the same nothingness, so that this became the source of unconditioned solidarity [Zueinandergehören]. Precisely the death that each and every human being must die on his or her own, that isolates each individual to the utmost, precisely this death and the readiness to its sacrifice are what first creates the space of community out of which camaraderie arises. Does camaraderie arise therefore from fear? No and yes. No, if like the petty bourgeois one understands by fear only the helpless trembling of a cowardly panic. Yes, if fear is comprehended as the metaphysical proximity to the unconditioned that is bestowed solely on the highest independence and readiness. If we do not force powers into our Dasein that, just as unconditionally as death in the shape of free sacrifice, bind and isolate, i.e. attack at the roots of the Dasein of each individual, and stand just as deeply and utterly in a genuine knowledge, then there will not be any “camaraderie”; at best what will come about will be an altered form of society.²⁷

The authentic Being-towards-death that, in 1927, is named the concealed ground of the historicity of Dasein is identified seven years later with the experience of the trenches. Heidegger is not speaking here at first hand, since during his brief period of military service in World War One he was never engaged in fighting at the front. Nonetheless, he is not simply paraphrasing a passage from Jünger, for example. Keen to uncover an imperialist politics in Heidegger’s writings, Fritzsche attributes to the above text the proposition that war is the ground of community.²⁸ Heidegger, however, says nothing of war as such and, in a gesture of continuity with Being and

Time, concentrates instead on fear. War is certainly the precondition of this fear, but that does not of itself render it the ground of that ground of community which is fear. Fritsche's interpretation endeavours to reduce Heidegger's text to an apology for the wars of imperialism, even though territorial conquest and supranational recognition are not what is at stake in the trenches for Heidegger. That Heidegger offers a justification of war is, nonetheless, indisputable. As war is the juncture of circumstances in which human finitude becomes a concern, Heidegger underwrites ontologically the deployment of the Wehrmacht, and Being and Time is thereby pulled into the German mythopœism of the military after WWI. In one respect, Heidegger's account of war is still more objectionable than the imperialist apologies to which Fritsche assimilates it, because it remythologises war by means of the very elements through which it had been demythologised. The realism of the many post-war narratives, which had been received as denunciations of the experience of trench warfare, becomes simply grist to the mill of Heidegger's affirmation of fear. Fear has turned into an argument for war. It becomes the task, rather than the evasion, of the soldier at the front. In the Marburg lecture course History of the Concept of Time, Heidegger speaks accordingly of a "courage for dread in the face of death".²⁹ What Heidegger asks of the soldier is that he not steel himself in the face of death and thereby grow numb to the question of his own finitude through a leap into the infinite. For Heidegger, the enemy that the armed forces must confront in the trenches is Hegelian sublation. Given the very different task that Heidegger sets the soldier at the front, his notion of sacrifice in the 1934-5 text has to be seen to sit uneasily beside the customary right-wing eulogies of the volunteers who fell at Langemarck and elsewhere. Heidegger does not so much valorise sacrifice, therefore, as valorise the readiness for such sacrifice. No doubt this is already to go too far towards accommodating a militarist politics. In the readiness for the fear of the impending self-sacrifice, the soldiers at the front are to experience the transcendence and incommensurability of finitude. Through the fear it instils, war contests the fixation on the “now” in the vulgar understanding of time, bringing home to Dasein the truth of its being-outside-of-itself. Beside itself with fear, Dasein is a Being-with-others just as it is completely isolated as the unrepeatability of the uncontainable. Its free sacrifice is the event that awaits it as its own and that thus carries it beyond itself without delivering up its transcendence to an external entity. That for which Dasein sacrifices itself is irrelevant in comparison with the fact that Dasein sacrifices itself. Here in Heidegger’s lectures on Hölderlin, the provocation of the National Socialist policy of rearmament is accordingly endorsed, since war is intimated to be indispensable to the fulfilment of the movement’s promise to ground community. The Reich will not be the being present-at-hand that pre-exists Dasein’s self-sacrifice and whose defence is the rationale of sacrifice. Instead, community will be that which arises in the readiness for free sacrifice. Heidegger’s community of the trenches does not stand above its members in arbitration over their lives and deaths, because it is not cast in the nineteenth century’s pseudo-religious conception of the State. This community is the bond of finitude itself. Death, which for Hegel tears apart and mediates everything that is, necessarily grounds a State of another order than that which arises in the isolation and binding of Heidegger’s anticipation of death. Heidegger’s community does not situate itself in death but rather in the shadow of death. It arises in the expectation of death.

To anticipate death, even to run ahead into death (to translate literally Heidegger’s expression “in den Tod vorlaufen”), is not the same as to desire death. Heidegger’s community exists in a courtship of death. Nonetheless, it can only exist if it simultaneously defers death. It can therefore be said that what both attracted Heidegger to National Socialism and repulsed him was the bare physiological reality of corpses toward which the movement was hurrying. In Being and Time, the basis of Heidegger's future politics of a flirtation with death is clearly enunciated:

But Being towards this possibility, as Being-towards-death, is so to comport ourselves towards death that in this Being, and for it, death reveals itself as a possibility. Our terminology for such Being towards this possibility is “anticipation” of this possibility. But in this way of behaving does there not lurk a coming-close to the possible, and when one is close to the possible, does not its actualization emerge? In this kind of coming close, however, one does not tend towards concernfully making available something actual; but as one comes closer understandingly, the possibility of the possible just becomes ‘greater’. The closest closeness which one may have in Being towards death as a possibility, is as far as possible from anything actual. The more unveiledly this possibility gets understood, the more purely does the understanding penetrate into it as the possibility of the impossibility of any existence at all. Death, as possibility, gives Dasein nothing to be ‘actualized’, nothing which Dasein, as actual, could itself be.³⁰

The reality of death is, by definition, not the reality of Dasein (existence). As Heidegger writes: “The end of the entity qua Dasein is the beginning of the same entity qua something present-at-hand.”³¹ With death, the ontological exception that Dasein constitutes for the understanding of Being as presence is annulled. Hegel's courage in looking death in the face — in leaping into death to become one with it — lies exactly in his refusal to brook this exception to the understanding of Being as presence. It is a courage that, according to Heidegger, is much more a lack of seriousness with respect to the question of Being.

With respect, however, to National Socialism, Hegel's assimilation of death renders him invulnerable to the regime's promise of catastrophe. Death always comes too late for it to have any philosophical importance for Hegel, whereas, for Heidegger, that it should cease to be impending, and finally arrive, is not the fulfilment of a philosophical promise but its revocation.

If Heidegger, in his confrontation with Hegel, understands death as a catastrophe rather than as the element in which Spirit thinks itself, he does not mean to construe death as an event that takes place at its given time within a sequence of "nows". Such a construction of death would merely delay the attainment to the presence of death in which Hegel establishes his thinking from the very beginning. Setting out from death, Hegel's system encompasses the whole of life, but the price of its totality is an inability to grasp the Being specific to Dasein. Hegel sees everything, but thereby misses that what characterises Dasein is that "there is always something still outstanding".³²

In §48 of Being and Time, Heidegger writes of the positive nature of this deficiency:

That Dasein should be together only when its "not-yet" has been filled up is so far from the case that it is precisely then that Dasein is no longer. Any Dasein always exists in just such a manner that its "not-yet" belongs to it.³³

The “not-yet” of Dasein is the space of its possibility. Death, as the impossibility of Dasein, cannot be viewed as the realisation of this possibility:

With its death, Dasein has indeed ‘fulfilled its course’. But in doing so, has it necessarily exhausted its specific possibilities? Rather, are not these precisely what gets taken away from Dasein? Even ‘unfulfilled’ Dasein ends. On the other hand, so little is it the case that Dasein comes to its ripeness only with death, that Dasein may well have passed its ripeness before the end. For the most part, Dasein ends in unfulfilment, or else by having disintegrated and been used up.³⁴

Death is a catastrophe that happens, so to speak, against Dasein. It is not assimilated to Dasein and it does not realise Dasein’s possibilities. The “not-yet” is consumed in the moment of death simply by being torn away from Dasein. But with this moment of death, the vulgar understanding of temporality as a sequence of “nows” does not reassert itself in a containment of the transcendence of Dasein’s “not-yet”, since Dasein cannot be at its end, but only towards its end. Death, in this sense, is itself the “not-yet” of Dasein. The catastrophic character of Heidegger’s conception of death is its pure possibility. It is the event that does not take place — its “presence” is always only ever a “not-yet”.

And yet death, for Heidegger, is nonetheless certain. But on what grounds? That such a certainty could be derived from the overwhelming spectacle of the trenches is excluded by Being and Time:

We cannot compute the certainty of death by ascertaining how many cases of death we encounter. This certainty is by no means of the kind which maintains itself in the truth of the present-at-hand. When something present-at-hand has been uncovered, it is encountered most purely if we just look at the entity and let it be encountered in itself. Dasein must first have lost itself in the factual circumstances [Sachverhalte] (this can be one of care's own tasks and possibilities) if it is to obtain the pure objectivity — that is to say, the indifference — of apodictic evidence. If Being-certain in relation to death does not have this character, this does not mean that it is of a lower grade, but that it does not belong at all to the graded order of the kinds of evidence we can have about the present-at-hand.³⁵

Death is not certain in the same way that one can be certain of the veracity of the proposition that the battlefield is strewn with corpses. It is of a different order of certainty, since it is the ground of the certainty of propositions relating to the present-at-hand. The “not-yet” of death constitutes the very essence of Dasein and the basis for its identification with ecstatic temporality. Heidegger accordingly speaks of the certainty of death as “indefinite”.³⁶ Death is at once certain and indefinite because, as the “not-yet” of originary temporality, it is the ground of the certainty of the present-at-hand without being itself present-at-hand. Foreshadowing his argument in “On the Essence of Truth”, Heidegger will make the certainty of a proposition — its correspondence to a state of affairs — depend upon a relation that he assigns to the transcendence of Dasein. All certainties come to rely on the indefiniteness and excess of the “not-yet” of Dasein's inevitable death:

Therefore the evidential character which belongs to the immediate givenness of Experiences, of the “I”, or of consciousness, must necessarily lag behind the certainty which anticipation includes. Yet this is not because the way in which these are grasped would not be a rigorous one, but because in principle such a way of grasping them cannot hold for true (disclosed) something which at bottom it insists upon ‘having there’ as true: namely, Dasein itself, which I myself am, and which, as a potentiality-for-Being, I can be authentically only by anticipation.³⁷

Anticipating its death, Dasein anticipates itself because, in thinking that which can only be thought in its character of a “not-yet”, it thinks the impossibility of its own full disclosure. As a result, it thinks its non-assimilability to the understanding of Being as presence. Running ahead into death it runs away from the thanatography of National Socialism. In its anxiety before nothingness, it becomes an iconoclasm with respect to every presentation of death. Nourishing itself parasitically on the images of death that it destroys, Heidegger’s authentic Dasein comes to an “arrangement” with the morbidity of the regime. It comes to a fragile “arrangement” with commitment to the regime, to the possibility of sacrifice conceived purely as possibility.

In 1933, and with little resistance, Heidegger transforms himself into an advocate of nationalistic sacrifice. On January 23, 1934, in the text “The Call to the Labor Service”, he is able to write:

Those who are lame, comfortable, and effete will “go” into the Labor Service because it will perhaps jeopardize their degree and employment prospects to stay away. Those who are strong and unbroken are proud that extreme demands are being made of them: for that is the moment when they rise up to the hardest tasks, those for which there is neither pay nor praise, but only the “reward” of sacrifice and service in the area of the innermost necessities of German Being [deutschen Seins].³⁸

What is, for Heidegger, the “reward” of sacrifice? If this “reward” lies in an understanding of the essence of Being, a willingness to sacrifice has less to do with the maintenance of the Germany of National Socialism than with fundamental ontology. The willingness to die for a fatherland present-at-hand becomes a pretext. The passage on the camaraderie of the front, from the lecture course on Hölderlin of 1934-5, indicates that community, for Heidegger, does not pre-exist the readiness for sacrifice, but rather arises from it. The first stage of the National Socialist revolution — the stage of the conventionality of its nationalism — is arguably to give way to a second stage in which the nation, as the pseudo-religious recipient of sacrifice, will be revealed to be a makeshift for that bond of community that is itself the readiness for sacrifice. If Heidegger’s nationalism, like that of many others, was informed by the Fronterlebnis, it also bore the mark of his own meditations on finitude. The community born from the “courage for dread in the face of death” in the readiness to sacrifice does not shy away from its own finitude. Seeing through the eternal’s pretensions to originarity, it sees through the logicist nationalism of the pseudo-religious State. Such a State is inappropriate to the being that can die. Dasein’s deviation from the logic of the universal and the particular is that which, for Heidegger, constitutes the insight of the experience of the Angst of trench warfare. A nationalism that grounds itself in the Fronterlebnis cannot but confront the metaphysics of presence. It could be said that it is in order to participate in this confrontation that Heidegger enlisted in the NSDAP. Heidegger's nationalism in 1933 was not, therefore, the "psychological solution" to the Angst of 1927, but, on the contrary, its formulation as a philosophical-political programme. For the sake of the reward of the disclosure of the originarity of finitude in sacrifice, Heidegger will commit himself to a dictatorship. But where Heidegger incorporated in his conception of nationalism the terror of the Fronterlebnis, the regime will reject the accounts in which it is depicted and have them publicly burnt. However correct Marcuse may be in his thesis in Reason and Revolution concerning the irreconcilability of Hegel and National Socialism, for Heidegger the dictatorship will prove to be all too Hegelian in its logicist nationalism of the repression of finitude. Its promise of a continuation of the revolution will have been reneged.

National Socialism is the State that runs ahead into death, but it is not the State that extracts from the experience of the impending catastrophe of mortality an insight into Dasein's status as an ontological exception. It is the State of control, that is, of the essential controllability of the present-at-hand. As an apparatus of State terror, it conforms itself far more conspicuously to Hegel's knowability of everything that is, than to Heidegger's essential unrepresentability of Dasein. The regime applies itself to the task of uncovering all secrets, cataloguing all anomalies and tracking all movements. Aspiring to a dictatorship of absolute surveillance, it wants to be the light of knowledge in which beings are apprehended as they are in the full truth of their presence. Inasmuch as it refuses to any being an intrinsic unknowability, National Socialism overleaps the constitutive “not-yet” of Dasein, and exercises its terror on a population that it cannot distinguish ontologically from the mere presence-at-hand of the dead. The regime’s obsession with death will amount to a theatricalisation of Hegel’s understanding of death as the determinative negativity of what is, since it will be the State that explicitly and concretely conceives itself as death.

This is not to suggest that Hegel was a proto-Nazi. The genealogical line is not so narrow. What is at issue in Heidegger’s exposition of death is, however, an alternative to traditional ontology as it was brought to its ultimate expression by Hegel and as it underlies and unites National Socialism and all the doctrines of the State that were to stress their opposition to Hitler’s dictatorship. Hegel’s philosophy of the State, from out of whose sway the ideologues of the regime were unable to extricate themselves, is a philosophy that can praise the State in its identity with knowledge because it has first identified knowledge with control. Even if it is only later that Heidegger elaborates his critique of τεχνη as the reduction of knowledge to the art of the manipulation of beings, the existential analytic of Being and Time already raises an objection against defining knowledge by control. The essence of Dasein, and thus that which above all must be known with respect to Dasein, is the “not-yet” by which it withholds itself from an apprehension of its totality. Already dead, and hence already present-at-hand, Hegel’s Spirit is not frustrated in its self-knowledge by anything outstanding to it. And knowing itself, it knows the knowability of what is, of that which in his inaugural lecture in Berlin Hegel says cannot help delivering itself up to be known.³⁹ Hegel’s philosophy of the State, as the philosophy of Spirit in one of its manifestations, will necessarily place no restrictions on that which it is given to the State to know.

In the Remark to §209 of the Philosophy of Right, Hegel spurns cosmopolitanism for its refusal to press beyond a knowledge of the universal in its one-sidedness:

It is part of education, of thinking as the consciousness of the single in the form of universality, that the ego comes to be apprehended as a universal person in which all are identical. A man counts as a man in virtue of his manhood alone, not because he is a Jew, Catholic, Protestant, German, Italian, &c. This is an assertion which thinking ratifies and to be conscious of it is of infinite importance. It is defective only when it is crystallized, e.g. as a cosmopolitanism in opposition to the concrete life of the state.⁴⁰

Hegel here advances his thought as the reconciliation of liberalism and nationalism. Where liberalism is criticised for the one-sidedness of its universalism, nationalism is likewise criticised for the one-sidedness of its particularism. In line with such a scheme, it could be said that, in its ambitions to become the State of total surveillance, National Socialism was checked by its exclusively racist Weltanschauung. With its imperialism and its adoption of strength as the universal measure of peoples, the regime found its own way to the cosmopolitan. The casting of the human as a biological sample under National Socialism is certainly a degradation with respect to Hegel's determinative negativity, yet, for Heidegger, both interpretations of the human essence are already degraded in being grounded in the ontology of the present-at-hand, rather than in an "ontochrony". In the Hegelian philosophy, as well as in the Hitlerian dictatorship, it is a logic of control that is at work.

But at once it might be contested that this is simply not a just description of Hegel. What does control have in common with the bacchanalian revel of the Absolute? Is there not a glaring disparity between the notion of certainty applied by a police state and the self-certainty of Spirit? Does not the comparison between National Socialism and Hegel indefensibly conflate the certainty of the mere understanding and the certainty of dialectical reason? And are not the frequent concessions that Heidegger makes to Hegel in their Auseinandersetzung simply being passed over here for the sake of the caricature of a struggle between diametrically opposed philosophies?

The reductionism of the present reading has, however, its rationale, namely, to draw attention to the foundations of a logicist politics in Hegel's treatments of finitude and time. By addressing the avowed consistency of Hegel's politics and his philosophy, it is possible to perceive the consistency of Heidegger's critique of Hegel's philosophy and his own political engagement. The tenability, for instance, of Jacques Taminiaux's thesis in his article "Finitude and the Absolute: Remarks on Hegel and Heidegger"⁴¹ is thereby subjected to a number of reservations. Taminiaux quotes passages selected from Hegel for their affinities to certain Heideggerian texts, but whatever similarities can be rendered conspicuous between isolated propositions on truth and on nothingness, these propositions diverge in their sense when construed in connection with other statements dealing with politics. In other words, if the difference between Hegel and Heidegger is to be established, it is better sought in the discourses surrounding their respective acquiescences to the State than in the inconclusive playing off of the Infinite against finitude. That in which Hegel's

Infinite distinguishes itself from Heidegger's finitude — notwithstanding their shared territory in respect of nothingness, death and the acquiescence to the State — is the logicist conception of humanity with which it is bound up. Hegel dies, as it were, and overtakes his death in order to bring logic to politics. This could not be demonstrated more clearly than in his definition of the people in the System of Ethical Life:

A people is not a disconnected mass, nor a mere plurality. Not the former: a mass as such does not establish the connection present in ethical life, i.e., the domination of all by a universal which would have reality in their eyes, be one with them, and have dominion and power over them, and, so as they proposed to be single individuals, would be identical with them in either a friendly or a hostile way; on the contrary, the mass is absolute singularity, and the concept of the mass, since they are one, is their abstraction alien to them and outside them. Also not the latter, not a mere plurality, for the universality in which they are one is absolute indifference. In a plurality, however, this absolute indifference is not established; on the contrary, plurality is not the absolute many, or the display of all differences; and it is only through this “allness” that indifference can display itself as real and be a universal indifference.⁴²

Hegel's Volk is a concrete universal, neither a purely abstract unity nor a heterogeneous series of individuals. No matter how much the members of this Volk may differ among themselves, their identity with one another is never completely annulled. For Hegel, this identity is ethical, rather than biological. Such a qualification of the nature of the Volk's identity, as much as it is a necessary acknowledgement of Hegel's irreducibility to the Rassenkunde of the NSDAP, cannot disguise the fact that, in Hegel's logicist conception, humanity remains equally under the influence of the Dingbegriffe of classical ontology.

Against this influence, whose interrogation Heidegger declares a continuing task in the closing pages of Being and Time, the earlier analyses of Being-with-one-another are explicitly conceived. Rather than in an aggregate of subjects, in namely the apprehension, comparison and juxtaposition of distinct entities within the terms of the metaphysics of presence, Heidegger situates Being-with-one-another in historicity. Being-with-one-another is an affair, not of the mediation of the universal and the particular, but of the "not-yet" by which Dasein always overreaches itself. With this "not-yet", Heidegger attempts to secure the possibility of an understanding of the essence of the human without the interference of Dingbegriffe. In going further than Heidegger — in consuming the "not-yet" to arrive at death itself — Hegel is able to differentiate his conception of the human as the infinite negativity at one with death from the merely positive of the natural world. Yet this differentiation, for all the starkness of its opposition between the positive and the negative, is not a differentiation that delimits the scope of Dingbegriffe, since in the self-knowledge of its absolute negativity Spirit is present to itself and thus perpetuates the mode of Being that classical ontology ascribed to things. The positive in Hegel thus proceeds in its dismemberment (Zerrissenheit) only to be re-membered in this very violence. It does not scatter to become a being-outside-of-itself without return. In this respect, Heidegger's restraint before death is a more effective step against the hegemony of Dingbegriffe in the understanding of the human. The threat of death, and not its reality, scatters Being in the transcendence of the "not-yet" and thereby allows for a thought of community that is not an assemblage of discrete entities under a universal. In the outstanding totality of its “not-yet”, Dasein is always outside of itself and always a Being-with. It is thus always within the Volk.

Heidegger introduces the word “Volk” in §74 of Being and Time in order to align it with the essential Being-with-Others and Being-in-the-world of Dasein, but in doing so he says nothing of that which could exclude Dasein from the Volk. Where Hegel’s logicist conception of “Volk” explains both inclusion and exclusion by the scope of the ethical universal, Heidegger’s transcendence cannot, by definition, come up against a limit. This absence in Heidegger’s text of a criterion for distinguishing the identities of various peoples is by no means an oversight to be rectified by the supplement of the exclusive disjunctions of National Socialism’s Rassenkunde. Heidegger’s engagement in 1933 cannot be interpreted as providing the correction to his earlier “one-sidedness”. The concentration on transcendence throughout his writings is simply too emphatic for it to be plausible that he should ever have straightforwardly subscribed to a containment of transcendence and a restoration of the metaphysics of presence. What is at stake in Heidegger’s refusal, in 1927, to furnish a criterion for distinguishing peoples is not so much an inclusive humanism, than it is his effort to rethink the traditional understanding of Being on the basis of the transcendence of Dasein. Without any means to limit itself, Heidegger’s Volk does not recoil into the unity of humanity in general, because it is against unity as such that it defines itself as transcendence. Transcendence is an excess inasmuch as it presses beyond the one, and it is a restraint inasmuch as it never arrives at the other to the one it has left.

In his 1955 critique of Jünger, Heidegger will characteristically stress that it is this “in between” which more than anything else needs to be thought in the confrontation with the nihilism of metaphysics. Jünger, who wants to leap from the age of nihilism to “a new turning of Being”, passes by transcendence, when, for Heidegger, it is precisely by remaining within transcendence that the nihilism of the oblivion of Being is to be brought to the sobriety of reflection. With an unmistakable Hegelian resonance, Heidegger writes:

The human being not only stands within the critical zone of the line. He himself — but not taken independently, and especially not through himself alone — is this zone and thus the line. In no case does the line, thought as a sign of the zone of consummate nihilism, lie before the human being in the manner of something that could be crossed. In that case, however, the possibility of a trans lineam and of such a crossing collapses.⁴³

For Heidegger, the human being is the limit just as, for Hegel, the human understanding is the delimitation of what is. To be that which faces the limit as something external to it, irrespective of any success in “crossing the line”, is trivial beside the truth of being this limit itself. Jünger is thus much further from the Unthought of classical ontology than Hegel — he literally passes over transcendence. For this reason, the Auseinandersetzung with Jünger is not complicated by the exaggerations, concessions and ambiguities of the Auseinandersetzung with Hegel. Given the shared privileging of the limit over that which it delimits, the question in Heidegger’s confrontation with Hegel is what becomes of the limit. The political discourse that follows from its privileging is not unequivocal. There have been both revolutionary and reactionary politics of the limit. Renaming Heidegger’s

“transcendence”, Foucault, for instance, sounds uncomfortably like the author of the Philosophy of Right when he nonetheless speaks of the role and nature of transgression:

Its role is to measure the excessive distance that it opens at the heart of the limit and to trace the flashing line that causes the limit to arise. Transgression contains nothing negative, but affirms limited being — affirms the limitlessness into which it leaps as it opens this zone to existence for the first time. But correspondingly, this affirmation contains nothing positive: no content can bind it, since, by definition, no limit can possibly restrict it.⁴⁴

Transgression is the limitlessness of the limit itself and, in this identity with Hegel’s Spirit, it merges paradoxically and inadmissably with the State. If there is to be a difference from Hegel, and another politics than that of the Wise Man, it can only come from a transgression that transgresses itself, from a transcendence that does not cease to transcend. Thinking that which Heidegger was to term “transcendence”, and Foucault “transgression”, Hegel attributes an absolute power to the delimiting activity of the understanding. But with this enthronement of Spirit, its transcendence and transgression are not unleashed, but rather curtailed. In its absolute power, Spirit transcends and transgresses whatever is, and yet it stands in need of the positive for the demonstration of its power. Spirit differs from the positive only to the extent that it amounts to the universal that glues together the entities whose definition has been inherited from classical ontology. The opportunity for an interrogation of the metaphysics of presence is thereby lost, because Spirit’s distance from the positive is interpreted as its authority over — and hence responsibility for — whatever is. Power over the positive becomes nothing more than the duty to justify the positive. Crudely put, Hegel's response to the Un-thought of classical ontology is the conviction that he must justify to himself the existence of the Prussian State. As a result, Heidegger's objection to Hegel is not that he purely and simply neglected the question of Being (any number of passages can be cited from his works for their "anticipations" of Heidegger's thinking), but, on the contrary, that he did not allow his insight into the originarity of transcendence to call the positive into question. Hegel, in effect, assimilated transcendence to presence.

Yet why is it that Hegel throws the self-evidence of the present-at-hand into crisis only to rediscover the security of classical ontology in this very crisis? As far as this decision regarding the crisis of the metaphysics of presence is political, it can be traced back to Hegel's horror of the vacuity that he perceived in Romanticism. In his predilection for the substantial, Hegel is drawn to the concrete life of the State. In §257 and its Remark from the Philosophy of Right, Hegel writes:

The state is the actuality of the ethical Idea. It is ethical mind qua the substantial will manifest and revealed to itself, knowing and thinking itself, accomplishing what it knows and in so far as it knows it. The state exists immediately in custom, mediately in individual self-consciousness, knowledge, and activity, while self-consciousness in virtue of its sentiment towards the state finds in the state, as its essence and the end and product of its activity, its substantive freedom.

The Penates are inward gods, gods of the underworld; the mind of a nation [Volksgeist] (Athene for instance) is the divine, knowing and willing itself. Family piety is feeling, ethical behaviour directed by feeling; political virtue is the willing of the absolute end in terms of thought.⁴⁵

The State is the manifestation and revelation of the ethical Idea. It is the means whereby the ethical Idea knows itself and likewise the end as which it knows itself. Through negating the actuality and substantiality of the State, the ethical Idea knows itself in its difference from the positive. And through knowing itself only by this negative relation, it simultaneously takes up this actuality and substantiality as an essential moment in its self-knowledge. Knowledge in Hegel could thus be said to betray itself even as it exhibits the greatest fidelity. Hegel's insight into the Unthought of the understanding of Being as presence constitutes an advance in the knowledge of beings, and yet it is not a knowledge that can know itself as an advance and enrichment of knowledge without reinstating the understanding of beings that its insight had overthrown. It is perhaps in reaction to Hegel that Heidegger formulates the imperative in the Contributions to Philosophy to think Being by itself.

That Hegel does not think Being by itself — that he thinks it with respect to beings and hence politically with respect to the concrete life of the State — is not, of course, the grounds of the apparent National Socialist polemic. In Mein Kampf, it is the theorization of the State as the end of activity that Hitler rejects:

The state is a means to an end. Its end lies in the preservation and advancement of a community of physically and psychically homogeneous creatures.⁴⁶

But Hitler is not referring to the State as such. It is the existing apparatus of the racially indifferent state of liberalism that he has in view and to whose exploitation in the service of the new, racially grounded state he aspires. Hegel's thesis in regard to the state as the consummation of the self-knowledge of consciousness is neither affirmed nor denied. It is thus difficult to discern in such a statement by Hitler any genuine Auseinandersetzung with the Philosophy of Right, which is to say that it is difficult to discern any continuity between National Socialism's denunciations of the Weimar republic and Heidegger's commentaries on Hegel. Were it not for the fact of Heidegger's engagement and the importance of his confrontation with Hegel, there would be little incentive to try to find in the regime any encouragement of an anti-Hegelian politics.

What is it, then, in the NSDAP that could have drawn Heidegger to it? More cautious than many of Heidegger's critics, Cassirer suggests, in The Myth of the State, that Heidegger's relationship to National Socialism has more to do with a lack of resistance than any obvious attraction and convergence: "a theory that sees in the Geworfenheit of man one of his principal characters [has] given up all hopes of an active share in the construction and reconstruction of man's cultural life."⁴⁷ Cassirer notes in the Geworfenheit of Dasein the abjectness of resignation, but he misses its own specific, ontological task. Was Heidegger's engagement with National Socialism an engagement in truth with the abjectness of such an engagement, with its affront to the self-collectedness of the liberal subject? Insofar as the regime's spurious anti-statism furnishes nothing for an Auseinandersetzung with Hegel, it is a matter of looking elsewhere for any polemical inspirations that may lie behind Heidegger's engagement.

In 1933, the disgusting submissiveness to Hitler that Heidegger enunciates in propositions that otherwise appear at variance with Heidegger's earlier thinking, does not leave untouched the question of his relation to Hegel. There is in these texts a slavishness that outstrips anything in Hegel, as though Heidegger were wanting to arrest the dialectic of Master and Slave. In the Phenomenology of Spirit, Hegel's slave proceeds too quickly from the fear of death to self-certainty:

For this consciousness has been fearful, not of this or that particular thing or just at odd moments, but its whole being has been seized with dread; for it has experienced the fear of death, the absolute Lord. In that experience it has been quite unmanned, has trembled in every fibre of its being, and everything solid and stable has been shaken to its foundations. But this pure universal movement, the absolute melting-away of everything stable, is the simple, essential nature of self-consciousness, absolute negativity, pure being-for-self, which consequently is implicit in this consciousness. This moment of pure being-for-self is also explicit for the bondsman, for in the lord it exists for him as his object. Furthermore, his consciousness is not this dissolution of everything stable merely in principle; in his service he actually brings this about. Through his service he rids himself of his attachment to natural existence in every single detail; and gets rid of it by working on it.⁴⁸

The Hegelian bondsman (Knecht) or slave does not rid himself of his fear of death by work. Work is rather the actuality of the fear of death and the dissolution of everything stable. It is thus no longer the lasting monument that cheats mortality. Hegel breaks with the tradition that considers the fear of death something to be surmounted. The ataraxy of the Stoics, The Consolation of Philosophy by Boethius and Montaigne's essay "That to study philosophy, is to learn to die"⁴⁹ have less in common with Hegel's text than do Heidegger's writings from the 1920s and '30s. But the resemblance should not be overestimated. The "fear" of Hegel's slave receives its definition from the metaphysical understanding of knowledge:

Without the discipline of service and obedience, fear remains at the formal stage, and does not extend to the known real world of existence. Without the formative activity, fear remains inward and mute, and consciousness does not become explicitly for itself.⁵⁰

Fear, for Hegel, is most truly fear when it is realised, i.e. rendered concrete in the work. It is not fear as such that is surmounted, only its formalism and mute inwardness. By contrast, in Heidegger's account of fear in §40 of Being and Time, this formalism and mute inwardness will be set forth as the very essence of fear — its "realisation" in the experience that the thingly is that which is precisely missing. Hegel's fear becomes objective because, within the understanding of Being in which it occurs, the decision has already been made for the present-at-hand. Not even the nothingness of fear is allowed to withstand the pull of the actual, since that which is fully known is that which is known in its concreteness. If the fear of death is here embraced as the starting point of philosophy, whereas prior to Hegel philosophy was considered to begin from its repression, it is because finitude no longer arises as an issue. The absolute, and thus non-impending, negativity of self-consciousness is the sole experience of this fear. Hegel's slave is incapable of an abasement that would involve even his self-certainty. He works for the master only to the extent that he works against him and fashions with the product the reality of his independence.

In the collection of notes "Overcoming Metaphysics" Heidegger is blunt in his appraisal of work:

The still hidden truth of Being is withheld from metaphysical humanity. The laboring animal is left to the giddy whirl of its products so that it may tear itself to pieces and annihilate itself in empty nothingness.⁵¹

Without a relation to the truth of Being, Dasein is no more than a labouring animal. The work by which the Hegelian slave raises himself to the element of thinking is that by which humanity, according to Heidegger, is tumbled towards its ruin. But is this note from the years 1936-46 to be interpreted as a self-criticism? Is it simply a retraction of the 1934 text "The Call to the Labor Service" with its differentiation between the animal and the spirituality of work? Can the earlier text be read at face-value? If Heidegger's engagement truly constituted an adoption of the Hegelian position on work, then a Marxist party would seem a much more obvious choice than the NSDAP. The nationalsozialistische deutsche Arbeiterpartei is however a party of the workers who do not work in Hegel's sense. They work without ever finding in work their independence from the decrees of the Lord, and their fear of death is correspondingly never "realised". The Nazi worker is the slave who has been left behind by the dialectics of the history of Spirit. The charge cannot be dismissed out of hand that, in his engagement with the NSDAP, Heidegger seeks to become, as it were, the mouthpiece of the Lumpenproletariat. That which, from a Marxist-Hegelian point of view, is repulsive in National Socialism — namely the aborted emergence through work of class consciousness — is not that which in itself attracts Heidegger to the movement.⁵² This aborting of class consciousness is, however, the corollary of the challenge raised to the metaphysics of presence by the being-outside-of-itself of fear.

If asserting that Heidegger's political engagement was directly grounded in his Auseinandersetzung with Hegel seems implausible, then it should at least be remembered what Heidegger explicitly stated with regard to communism, in a letter to Marcuse after the war:

Concerning 1933: I expected from National Socialism a spiritual renewal of life in its entirety, a reconciliation of social antagonisms and a deliverance of Western Dasein from the dangers of communism.⁵³

And that communism was, in Heidegger's eyes, by no means an illegitimate descendent of Hegel is clear from the "Letter on 'Humanism'". Beneath its superficial generosity⁵⁴, the more famous text is a restatement of the belligerent position expressed simultaneously in the letter to Marcuse and formulated with respect to the Hegelian principle of "work" in "Overcoming Metaphysics". The merit of Marx is not distinct from the dangers of communism, since his merit is to provide the philosophical exposition of that fundamental, metaphysical danger of which communism is but one, albeit overwhelming, manifestation. This danger is the danger of τεχνη, namely that danger which, according to the contentious parenthesis from An Introduction to Metaphysics, it is the “inner truth and greatness” of National Socialism to encounter. Marx’s status in the “Letter on ‘Humanism’” is thus similar to Jünger’s in “On the Question of Being” in that Marx brings a problem to light without understanding it as a problem:

What Marx recognized in an essential and significant sense, though derived from Hegel, as the estrangement of the human being has its roots in the homelessness of modern human beings. This homelessness is specifically evoked from the destiny of being in the form of metaphysics, and through metaphysics is simultaneously entrenched and covered up as such. Because Marx by experiencing estrangement attains an essential dimension of history, the Marxist view of history is superior to that of other historical accounts.⁵⁵

Marx is here praised for placing the experience of estrangement at the centre of his account of history, just as “On the Question of Being” pays compliment to Jünger for his focus on the phenomenon of nihilism. Although Marx’s whole critique of the expropriation of labour under capitalism, and the reduction of humanity to manipulable material, rests on the notion of estrangement, he does not recognise, in Heidegger’s judgement, the roots themselves of estrangement in homelessness. Marx correctly grasps estrangement as the essence of the history of metaphysics, but he does not grasp that this essence is an evasion with respect to the question of Being.

Continuing to speak of Marxism and its Hegelian legitimacy, Heidegger aligns communism with τεχνη, and thereby indicates what he saw as the essential danger of communism:

The modern metaphysical essence of labor is anticipated in Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit as the self-establishing process of unconditioned production, which is the objectification of the actual through the human being, experienced as subjectivity. The essence of materialism is concealed in the essence of technology, about which much has been written but little has been thought. Technology is in its essence a destiny within the history of being and of the truth of being, a truth that lies in oblivion. For technology does not go back to the τεχνη of the Greeks in name only but derives historically and essentially from τεχνη as a mode of αληθευειν, a mode, that is, of rendering beings manifest. As a form of truth technology is grounded in the history of metaphysics, which is itself a distinctive and up to now the only surveyable phase of the history of being. No matter which of the various positions one chooses to adopt toward the doctrines of communism and to their foundation, from the point of view of the history of being it is certain that an elemental experience of what is world-historical speaks out in it. Whoever takes "communism" only as a "party" or a "Weltanschauung" is thinking too shallowly.⁵⁶

Communism is inadequately described as a party or a Weltanschauung because in communism there takes place a primordial experience of beings in their objectification through labour. Unless it is believed that Heidegger's preference for the NSDAP over Marxism can be fully explained by the attitudes prevalent among the provincial petty bourgeoisie of the 1930s, then such statements with regard to the philosophical significance of communism have to be taken seriously as a confession of what Heidegger thought was at stake in his political engagement. As much as communism is an insight into the essential estrangement of the human being, it is also a danger because its insight does not reach far enough into the ground of estrangement. Derived from Hegel's understanding of labour, Marx's insight remains metaphysical. The homelessness of modern human beings is not experienced as such, since it is experienced as the expropriation of labour rather than as a falling away from the equation of the human essence with originary temporality. Whereas both Marx and Heidegger criticise the reification of humanity, Marx, unlike Heidegger, does not argue that any logicist conception of humanity amounts to a reification. Marx's response to estrangement is thus inspired by a definition of the human essence that is still governed, according to Heidegger, by the Dingbegriffe of classical ontology.

That to which Marx objects in capitalism, and in Hegel's theory of the State, is that the logicist conception of humanity has not yet come to its full flowering. In his Critique of Hegel's 'Philosophy of Right', Marx thus condemns Hegel for deviating from his logic in order to accommodate the political constitution of his day:

It is not a question of developing the determinate idea of the political constitution, but of giving the political constitution a relation to the abstract Idea, of classifying it as a member of its (the Idea's) life history. This is an obvious mystification.⁵⁷

Hegel's mystification of the positive is, for Marx, an obfuscation of his own recognition of the absolute negativity of the human being. Hegel's philosophy becomes the expression of the inconsistency of capitalism and its "hypocritical, bourgeois cosmopolitanism"⁵⁸. Having emerged into history through the dissolution of the positive in the slave's fear, the universality of human Spirit still lacks the immanent determinative power that Hegel himself attributes to it. Under capitalism it remains the extrinsic universality of homo oeconomicus, i.e. the universal of quantifiable labour that regulates trade and allows the disparities in the living conditions of concrete human beings to persist unchecked. It is accordingly against the speciousness of bourgeois cosmopolitanism that Marx expostulates, reserving for a genuine cosmopolitanism the deliverance of humanity from its reification. The reduction of workers to the commodity of their labour is to be reversed by a substantive dissolution of the particularity of the positive in the element of the universality of self-consciousness. In Hegel, this dissolution was merely "ideological". Hegel, for Marx, is too little a logician, since his philosophy retains much that is irrational and obscurantist. The task that Marx sets himself in his own Auseinandersetzung with Hegel is a perfection of the universalism of the latter's thought, rather than its ontological destruction. The estrangement of modern human beings is to be countered in communism by a recovery into the universality of the human essence.

But such a recovery will decide nothing with regard to Heidegger's notion of homelessness, because even in its universality the human essence continues to be thought inauthentically. Communism cannot effect a deliverance of humanity from the sway of reification, since the equality of a genuine cosmopolitanism is grounded in the understanding of Being as presence. Without the apprehensibility of the distinctness of beings in presence there is no foundation for the claim of their equality. Under communism, Dasein will have been disentangled from its identifications with the commodity only to be still thought as a being present-at-hand in the iterable distinctness of its logicist essence.

)

But is the “Letter on ‘Humanism’” really, at bottom, a criticism of Marx? To overlook the antagonism of its position involves any commentary on Heidegger in a number of difficulties. The remark on the dangers of communism in the contemporaneous letter to Marcuse cannot be reconciled with any endorsement of Marx, just as Heidegger’s enlistment in a political party vociferously opposed to Marxism must itself be considered to indicate, at least, a mistrust of the latter’s tenets. But if Heidegger was wanting to distance himself from National Socialism after the war, could he have found a better means than an appeal to the resurgent Marxism of the French intelligentsia? And yet, as this appeal would consist in a textually unfounded identification of Marx’s account of estrangement and Heidegger’s account of homelessness, it is hard to imagine that Heidegger, as a historian of philosophy, could so forget himself. To dwell here on the unacceptability of the identification may illuminate a negative reason for Heidegger’s political engagement, namely his rejection of Marxism. This can be done by addressing a reading of the two thinkers that does not notice the fundamental difference between their conceptions of alienation and confounds the universalism of the one with the other’s suspicion of the well-foundedness of the ontic.

Kostas Axelos, in Einführung in ein künftiges Denken: Über Marx und Heidegger, seemingly takes for granted Lucien Goldmann’s thesis that Being and Time ends with an exhortation to elaborate and deepen Lukács’s (and not, more plausibly, Husserl’s⁵⁹) theory of reified consciousness.⁶⁰ Drawing attention to a distinction in the young Marx with the purpose of “radicalising” Marx and bringing him closer to his own equally peculiar understanding of Heidegger, Axelos writes:

He speaks of the “presupposition” of Socialism-Communism and even writes on a badly ripped and scarcely legible page of the Paris Manuscript: “If we still characterise communism itself — because as negation of the negation, as the appropriation of the human essence that mediates itself with itself through negation of private property, accordingly not yet as the true [Marx’s emphasis] position that begins from itself but, on the contrary, from private property” (p. 264), then that must mean that estrangement is not actually sublated.⁶¹

But is it the object per se that Marx wants to overthrow or simply the institution of private property? Is any object whatsoever an obstacle to genuine cosmopolitanism? Or merely reified humanity in its particularity? For Axelos, in 1966, the quoted passage from the Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts is, extraordinarily, a reservation on Marx’s part with respect to communism, as though Marx considered an absolute recuperation of the human essence — the true negation of that negation which is the externality of, among other things, private property — to be the highest political good.

In his 1967 preface to History and Class Consciousness, Lukács confesses that it was precisely under the impact of reading in 1930 this text by Marx that he repudiated his earlier blanket opposition to objectification:

In the process of reading the Marx manuscript all the idealist prejudices of History and Class Consciousness were swept to one side. It is undoubtedly true that I could have found ideas similar to those which now had such an overwhelming effect on me in the works of Marx that I had read previously. But the fact is that this did not happen, evidently because I read Marx in the light of my own Hegelian interpretation.⁶²

Axelos, who translated History and Class Consciousness into French, is perhaps under the sway of the Hegelian Marxism of Lukács's text when, in the Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts, he takes the true sublation of externality to be desirable. A true sublation of externality, as Lukács later argues, could only be desirable from "a failure to subject the Hegelian heritage to a thoroughgoing materialist reinterpretation."⁶³ The consequence of such a sublation is the very impossibility of materialism:

But as, according to Hegel, the object, the thing exists only as an alienation from self-consciousness, to take it back into the subject would mean the end of objective reality and thus of any reality at all. History and Class Consciousness follows Hegel in that it too equates alienation with objectification [Vergegenständlichung] (to use the term employed by Marx in the Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts). This fundamental and crude error has certainly contributed greatly to the success enjoyed by History and Class Consciousness.⁶⁴

The crude error of History and Class Consciousness is that the object was to be taken back into the subject without remainder: the destruction and preservation of Hegel's Aufhebung is reduced to destruction. That which in Hegel is ideological, namely the reappropriation of the human essence that nonetheless leaves existing conditions intact, is also that which constitutes the realism of his philosophy. Lukács acknowledges his own earlier lack of realism when he compares the identical subject-object in Hegel with the messianic proletariat of History and Class Consciousness:

Of course, in Hegel it arises in a purely logical and philosophical form when the highest stage of absolute spirit is attained in philosophy by abolishing alienation and by the return of self-consciousness to itself, thus realising the identical subject-object. In History and Class Consciousness, however, this process is socio-historical and it culminates when the proletariat reaches this stage in its class consciousness, thus becoming the identical subject-object of history. This does indeed appear to 'stand Hegel on his feet'; it appears as if the logico-metaphysical construction of the Phenomenology of Mind had found its authentic realisation in the existence and the consciousness of the proletariat. [...] But is the identical subject-object here anything more in truth than a purely metaphysical construct?⁶⁵

In 1967, Lukács answers in the negative. He has made his peace with objectification, "for objectification is indeed a phenomenon that cannot be eliminated from human life in society."⁶⁶ When Axelos attributes to the young Marx the political ambition of a complete reappropriation of objective reality, it is thus in defiance of what Lukács will have come to view as the essence of Marxist materialism. And by virtue of his socio-historical recasting of Hegel, Axelos is likewise in defiance of Heidegger. The solution that Axelos proffers to estrangement is the reappropriation of objective reality, whereas for Heidegger the oneness of such a delivered humanity would still denote an estrangement from the ecstases of originary temporality.

Heidegger does not attempt to overcome estrangement in the wisdom that is at one with all that is, i.e. in Lukács's words to "out-Hegel Hegel".⁶⁷ Instead Heidegger attempts, one might say, to "out-die" Hegel. Heidegger's critique of Hegel is, accordingly, informed by a stricter adherence, not so much to universalism, as to mortality. Hegel's philosophy is a philosophy of death that is at once a philosophy of eternity. It begins at a point beyond death and, as it is born in the ruin of sensuous immediacy, it faces from the outset the universal and its absolute present. For Hegel, the Whole is the True because he begins at the point at which everything is unconcealed. That which is essentially concealed, and still announced itself for the Greeks in the genuine contest between ἀληθεια and forgetfulness, simply does not exist in his philosophy. Hegel is unable to think the catastrophic character of Dasein. Being is already resolved into the totality of the mediation between the universal and the particular, between the subject and the object. It is at least in part Heidegger's understanding of death that renders him insusceptible to a politics that defines itself by the goal of genuine cosmopolitanism or the totality of subject and object. Heidegger's rejection of the universalism of Marxism cannot be wholly ascribed to provincialist prejudices, but must be appraised also in the context of his interrogation of the appropriateness of the universal to Dasein. In the essential "not-yet" of its Being-towards-death, Dasein never ceases to die and thus never ceases to defer the moment in which it would be sundered from the ontological undecidability of sensuous immediacy and handed over definitively to the absolute present of the universal. What is handed over in death is not Dasein, but a being present-at-hand. By its elevation to the universal, humanity is tricked, as it were, into accepting the authority of the Dingbegriffe of classical ontology. The realisation of the universal class in early Marx is, for Althusser, a “religious” concept of the proletariat,⁶⁸ and, indeed, there is something numinous in a substantive cosmopolitanism. But more than simply for its religious analogy, the universal class is to be criticised for obscuring Dasein’s status as an exception to the ontology of the present-at-hand. The humanity that has come to itself in its universality is no longer the being-outside-of-itself that transcends the metaphysics of presence. Where, for Marx, estrangement lies in reified humanity’s being outside of its own universalist essence, for Heidegger the estrangement of reification lies, by contrast, in humanity’s being outside of its essential being-outside-of-itself. And because being-outside-of-itself is originary for Heidegger, estrangement can never be recuperated. Fallenness (Verfallenheit), as Heidegger stresses again and again in Being and Time, is not a condition to be rectified or deplored. It is, however, a condition to be understood — and understood despite the metaphysical determination of understanding — in its foundations in the essential being-outside-of-itself of Dasein. In its lostness in the “they”, in its fallenness and inauthenticity, Dasein is still essentially and conspicuously a being-outside-of-itself, even as it takes itself for something present-at-hand. Furthermore — and herein Heidegger’s account attests to its irreconcilability with Hegelianism — it is still closer to its essential being-outside-of-itself in its lostness, than in the self-collection and containment of its self-understanding. Marx’s critique of alienation notes the being-outside-of-itself of reified humanity, but inasmuch as Marx interprets it as a condition to be made good in the regulated transcendence of the universal, Marx's critique remains true to its Hegelian roots in its relation to the Un-thought of classical ontology. In communism everything is pulled back to the centre of the absolute present of the death of Spirit.

While it is not easy to discover what could have attracted Heidegger in the biologism of the NSDAP, he was clearly receptive to the movement's hostility towards Marxism. It goes without saying that this hostility did not develop in the direction of a questioning concerning the truth of Being. National Socialism broke with the consciousness of Hegel's pure ego and the class consciousness of the Marxist proletariat, but it did not escape the sway of the metaphysics of presence. In the Contributions to Philosophy, Heidegger censures a notion of the Volk that still admits the model of the "I":

It is only on the basis of Da-sein that the essence of the people can be grasped and that means at the same time knowing that the people can never be goal and purpose and that such an opinion is only a "folkish" [>völkisch<] extension of the "liberal" thought of the "I" and of the economic idea of the preservation of "life".⁶⁹

Situated in Dasein's Being-there in a world, the essence of the Volk is situated in that which is lost to view with the abstraction of the "I". The people can never be made a goal or a purpose in, for instance, the propaganda of a "folkish" state, because the abstraction presupposed for the setting of any goal or purpose never comes up with anything that could properly be called the Volk. Defined by the historicity, i.e. the transcendence of Dasein, the Volk is too indefinite to fulfil the role of a purpose. It transcends itself and thus lacks the stability to constitute a measure. The ontic instability of the Volk is not a shortcoming, but rather a necessary consequence of its originarity. The Volk cannot be modelled on the “I”, because it precedes it in the very same sense that the transcendence of Dasein precedes the presence and self-identity of the subject. Nothing needs to be added to Dasein in order to arrive at the Volk. Without distorting matters too much, it could therefore be contended that Heidegger’s people can be traced back to Husserl’s demotion of the epistemological subject of Neo-Kantianism, since it is in his critique of psychologism and anthropomorphism that Husserl opened Heidegger’s eyes to the primacy of intentionality and what he was to call “transcendence”. With the early theory of the categorial intuitions, Husserl short-circuits the transcendental subject in the Logical Investigations. He raises the possibility of no longer conceiving knowledge as the commerce between the individual intuitions of the phenomenal world and the categories that have their seat in the stability and unity of the subject. Hegel’s pure ego is to be displaced from its position of authority over what is, and being-outside-of-itself is not automatically to fall under the rule of the One in being known. The self-presence of death ceases to be as desirable as its anticipation and deferral. For Heidegger, his political engagement will be determined in part by this courtship of death.

II Ontological Opportunism

Everywhere he goes, Ortega y Gasset encounters the masses. Suddenly, and without anyone knowing why, the hotels, waiting rooms, theatres, railways and seaside resorts have become overcrowded. And yet, as Ortega y Gasset notes in his report on the circumstances of European demagoguery, the population has not increased: "Approximately the same number of people existed fifteen years ago."¹ For Ortega y Gasset in 1930 the masses do not define themselves in terms of a quantitative result, just as for Heidegger in 1927 a people is not the sum of many subjects. The congestion with which the masses have enveloped the public places is not a consequence of a numerical excess, since, for Ortega y Gasset, it is as the quality of numerical excess per se that the masses appear at all. Endemic to public places, they necessarily resist the analysis and decomposition into isolated individuals by which their numerability could be assured. They are a number that cannot be counted. In their character of a pure "too much", the masses push themselves forward as perverse suitors for the Kantian sublime. At every turn, Ortega y Gasset witnesses the collapse of the spectacle of the individual before the monolithic quantity of homogeneous humanity. For Ortega y Gasset, lacking Heidegger's suspicion of the antithesis between the individual and the "they", and thus lacking any insight into the appeal of his individualism for a fascist readership, the uprising of the masses is nothing but the failure of individuation. It is thus a population at a loss what to do with itself that overruns the public places. Heidegger's political engagement, and National Socialism itself, was an attempt to assume the leadership of this uprising.

For Heidegger in 1933, the masses were not to be urged to retreat from the public places. On the contrary, the uprising of the masses, once it had been led beyond a satisfaction with the externality of "folkish" accoutrements, was expected to become the Volk of the question of Being. This transformation of the masses was to coincide with a transformation of the German university. From his position as rector of Freiburg University, Heidegger wanted to bring the university into line with the ontological mission of the German Volk. This did not entail imposing a general framework on faculties that had previously been autonomous. The apparent autonomy of the faculties was, in Heidegger's judgement, nothing other than their homogenisation in the liberal conception of science. The "crisis" of the specialisation of the sciences was a consequence of the fundamental aimlessness of this homogenisation. This question of the aim of the sciences, and of the Volk, is the question that Heidegger raises in "The Self-Assertion of the German University". In his essay "But Suppose We Were to Take the Rectorial Address Seriously... Gérard Granel's De l'université", Christopher Fynsk accordingly writes:

Heidegger posed the [...] question to the German university: were the sciences to be? He [...] posed it from the basis of the [...] conception of the university's founding function, asserting that if the sciences were to assume their possibility, they would have to recapture their essence in a renewal of the Greek concept of τεχνη (what Heidegger named "...the innermost center of the entire Dasein as a people in its state," "the power that hones and embraces Dasein in its entirety"). Finally, he asked this question with [a] revolutionary design. For he argued that only by recovering their originary "revolutionary" essence would the sciences be able to serve—in the sense of guiding and impelling—the National Socialist revolution.²

The sciences were to guide and impel the National Socialist revolution by renewing the Greek concept of knowledge (τέχνη). Fynsk, who does not take the rectoral address seriously enough, omits asking after the aim of a renewal of τέχνη. That which was to be known in this renewal — and could be known only by the Volk — was Dasein itself. To the mobilised population of Hitler's Germany the truth of Dasein, and thus the fundamental truth of all the sciences, was to reveal itself. And that is to say, it was to reveal the impossibility of its revelation in the light of presence.

“The Self-Assertion of the German University” is addressed to a popular uprising, but it is concerned with concealment. What interests Heidegger in the sudden publicness of the masses is not the privacy of Ortega y Gasset's individual, but rather the concealment that is the essence of the German Volk. In “The Self-Assertion of the German University”, Heidegger arguably aspires to involve the “folkish” uprising in his own confrontation with the metaphysics of presence. Incited in their nationalism and drilled in the definition of the non-positivity of German Volk, the masses were to be led to a collision with what is.

In hindsight, it is easy to see that Heidegger expected too much from the masses. The cynicism of hindsight, as it rests on the positivism with which it views the past, is incapable of appreciating the task that Heidegger set himself and the “folkish” uprising. For hindsight, Heidegger will always have come too late to direct the uprising down another path. Once the philosophical ambition of the rectoral address has been overlooked, Heidegger's political engagement loses any distance from National Socialism.

In the name of the Volk of the question of Being Heidegger appealed to the masses of a nationalist uprising. If Heidegger's appeal was to have a chance of success, the masses had to be nationalistic. The masses had to be open to an appeal to their nationalism, and inasmuch as an appeal needed to be made, the masses had to differ as yet from the Volk of the question of Being. Heidegger did not confuse the masses of National Socialism with the Volk of the question of Being, but he failed to bring about a transformation of the masses.

As a result, Heidegger's people in 1933 does not conspicuously differ from the populations public by default in which the various fascist movements took root. The possibility of the Volk of the question of Being is overshadowed by the reality of a racist mobilisation. But who were these masses that had no means of resisting the public spaces of National Socialism? On their own, the unemployed were too meagre a constituency. The fascist movements arose with the masses and simultaneously presented themselves as a solution to the masses. The masses were to be given something to do. And whereas, for Deleuze and Guattari, the people is born in the intermittent deterritorialisations of surplus labour³, for fascism, the people was born only in the reterritorialisation of surplus labour. The people of fascism defined itself by its work in the service of the nation. Surplus labour was absorbed, yet neither through the emergence of new modes of production (by which, for example, the cessation of popular unrest after the breakdown of feudalism can be explained) nor through one of the cyclic recuperations of global capitalism. The expediency of fascism is manifest in the makeshift with which it responded to the initial test of its popularity: work, which had been the obstacle to the inundation of the public places by the masses, was itself transformed into a political act. Under fascism, production became immediately a monument to the nation and a dictatorship of the petty bourgeoisie masqueraded as a Greek polis. The politicization of work, which is to say the subordination of production to the national good, was fascism's response to the ambulatory masses thrown up by economic depression. This response nonetheless simply displaced the problem of surplus into the realm of distribution. By virtue of its industrial superiority, Germany was in time subjected through this displacement to far fiercer pressures than Italy — rearmament under the NSDAP did not run up against the restrictions of a still largely agrarian work force. Invoked in order to restore surplus labour to its origins within the people, the nation was never wholly able to suppress the doubt that it was itself a matter of surplus and of excess. Assigning as its measure and truth an origin solicited from expediency, fascism set against the alienation of the masses under capitalism a rootedness in the fatherland of the lie. When Heidegger stepped forward as rector of Freiburg University to preach the fulfilment of the promise of ancient Greece, it was thus among the grandiose and yet likewise shabby stage scenery of Blut und Boden. The scandal of Heidegger's rectoral address is that the juxtaposition of ontology and demagoguery is never ordered in a moment of ironic "revelation".

What could Heidegger have seen in the nation of fascism? That the nation was to be seen constituted an imperative of the fascist movements. The nation is a result, rather than the starting point of fascism. It has to be produced. In his speech "The Tasks of the German Theatre", delivered on 8 May, 1933 in the Hotel Kaiserhof in Berlin, Goebbels notoriously pressed the movement's claim to creativity:

I am even of the opinion that politics is the highest art there is, since the sculptor shapes only the stone, the dead stone, and the poet only the word, which in itself is dead. But the statesman shapes the masses, gives them statute and structure, breathes in form and life so that a people arises from them.⁴

A people is the work of art for which the masses are the material and fascism the artist. For Goebbels, as for Heidegger, a people cannot be taken for granted. Yet, for Goebbels, a people that is missing is not Being-with-one-another in its inauthenticity, but dead, unindividuated matter. The people that is brought to life through the artistry of politicians is not essentially at odds with reification. To the extent that it comes to itself only inasmuch as it furnishes proof of the will to power of the politician as creator, the people does not come to itself at all, remaining an object over against an absolute subjectivity. Hence the fascist aestheticisation of politics acquires a more sinister meaning than the diremption of public discourse from the workings of government. In fascism the masses cannot even be duped because outside the fiction of the politician-aesthete, in which alone they become animate, they lack the means to be gullible. Here politics as the highest art — as that through which according to Democritus (Fragment 157) human beings come to praiseworthy successes — is reduced to taking its cue from Shaw's Pygmalion.

Less than three weeks after Goebbels' speech in Berlin, on 27 May, 1933 Heidegger delivered his inaugural address as the newly elected rector of Freiburg University. The stance taken in this address towards National Socialism and the "glory" and "greatness of this new beginning" is by no means unambiguous, and not least because after the war Heidegger insisted on a recognition of the defiance in its title — "The Self-Assertion of the German University". This defiance is better understood, however, in terms of Heidegger's ontological opportunism. Grounds for such an interpretation can be drawn from the address itself, and even from Heidegger's own apologetics. Heidegger was always too convinced of the philosophical superiority of his motivations to hide completely what was at stake.

In the text "The Rectorate 1933/34: Facts and Thoughts", Heidegger writes that a rector who had joined the NSDAP — but, unlike himself, not out of "defiance" — would have chosen another title than "Die Selbstbehauptung der deutschen Universität". But in pressing the case for his opposition to the new regime, Heidegger makes a slip:

One could excuse oneself from reflection and hold onto the seemingly obvious thought that, shortly after National Socialism seized power, a newly elected rector gives an address on the university, an address which “represents” National Socialism [welche Rede »den« Nationalsozialismus »vertritt«] — that is to say, proclaims the idea of “political science,” which, crudely understood, says “True is what is good for the people.” From this one concludes, and rightly so, that this betrays the essence of the German university in its very core and actively contributes to its destruction; for this reason, the title should be “The Self-Decapitation of the German University” [»Die Selbstenthauptung der deutschen Universität«].⁵

What jars with the exculpatory reasoning in this passage is the use of scare quotes around the definite article before “National Socialism”. It is as though Heidegger in 1945 only wishes to distance himself from the National Socialism of convention. To another and “private” National Socialism, such as that with which Wacker, the Baden minister of art, education and justice, charged him after hearing the address⁶, he seemingly retains his loyalty in the face of the full revelation of the regime’s atrocities. “The Self-Assertion of the German University” is thus a title that restricts its defiance to “the” NSDAP. Even in 1945, Heidegger’s “private” National Socialism did not cast aside its obvious mask in order to present itself unequivocally as an expression of opposition to the regime. No doubt the motif of a “private” National Socialism was Heidegger’s compromise between exculpation and plausibility. Heidegger’s National Socialism must be said to have always been private. Being and Time had not been repudiated by 1933, and its emphatic distinction of the human from the present-at-hand is inconsistent with the conception of humanity as manipulable material formulated in Goebbels’ speech to his audience in the Kaiserhof Hotel and later put into practice in breeding programmes and extermination camps. This “private” National Socialism of Heidegger’s constitutes a grey zone of servility and resistance. In “The Self-Assertion of the German University”, Aeschylus, Nietzsche, Clausewitz and Plato are referred to by name, but not Hitler, and yet this appearance of a rebuff is contradicted by the assiduity with which Heidegger as rector oversaw the Gleichschaltung of Freiburg University. Heidegger, who boasts in his interview with Der Spiegel in 1966 that no other rectoral address of the period dared as much with its title⁷, nonetheless telegrammed Hitler on 20 May, 1933 to ask for a “postponement of the planned reception of the executive committee of German universities until the moment when the direction of the university association [Hochschulverband] has been brought about in the sense of the Gleichschaltung that precisely here is especially necessary.”⁸ It would be easy and, within a certain context, justified to dismiss as merely verbal the defiance that in a frantic post-war apologetics Heidegger uncovers in the title of his address. To do so, however, entails foregoing any convincing reconstruction (which is not the same as a defence) of the terms on which Heidegger could align himself with a movement whose understanding of humanity was irreconcilable with his own. What is involved in a convincing reconstruction is more than the continuity and coherence of a biography. The irreconcilability with National Socialism of the understanding of humanity set forth repeatedly in Heidegger’s writings is, for its own sake, what must be defended in the face of ad hominem arguments.

The defiance of “The Self-Assertion of the German University”, insofar as it is the text itself that is in question and not just its free-floating title, lies in an excess, rather than in an opposition. Heidegger does not set himself against the movement, but seeks to follow it through to the point of exhaustion where it must give way to something else. In this sense, Heidegger is comparable to the Stalinist critics of the 1920s and ’30s who all but welcomed fascism as the catastrophic preamble to socialism. That Heidegger situates the merit of the “new beginning” in its chance of failure is evident from the extraordinary interpretation that he offers in the address of a verse by Aeschylus:

Among the Greeks there circulated an old report that Prometheus had been the first philosopher. It is this Prometheus into whose mouth Aeschylus puts an adage that expresses the essence of knowledge:

Techne d'ananges asthenstera makro

“But knowledge is far less powerful than necessity.” That means: all knowledge of things remains beforehand at the mercy of overpowering fate and fails before it.

It is precisely for that reason that knowledge must develop its highest defiance, for which alone the entire might of the concealedness of what is will first rise up, in order really to fail. Thus what is reveals itself in its unfathomable inalterability and confers its truth on knowledge. This adage about the creative impotence of knowledge is a saying of the Greeks, in whom we all too easily see the model for knowledge that, taking its stand purely on itself and thereby forgetting itself, counts among us as the “theoretical” attitude.⁹

Failure is, for Heidegger, not simply a method that knowledge has at its disposal in uncovering what is. Knowledge must fail in earnest, and in its every method, so that what is will reveal itself in its truth. Prior to its failure, knowledge is not strictly knowledge, but rather an unwitting collusion with the concealedness (Verborgenheit) of beings.

But why in the first months of the National Socialist regime did Heidegger expound this failure as the mission of the German university? Curiously, Heidegger declared in 1966 that he would be willing to repeat the rectoral address, and with a still greater vehemence than before.¹⁰ The untimeliness with which he no doubt wanted this confession to imbue the text — an untimeliness that he believed would likewise have marked the text's repetition in the BRD — is, in the circumstances of Heidegger's engagement, the untimeliness less of the apolitical than of the opportunistic. In the name of the failure of knowledge, Heidegger was prepared to disregard the long and public list of Nazi acts of brutality under the Weimar Republic and assume the office of rector after the social democrat von Möllendorff had been dismissed by the new regime as unsuitable. Even if other motivations can be adduced for Heidegger's engagement, in his most significant text as rector, it is on knowledge defined by failure that he fixes his attention in the altered conditions. Heidegger's "private" National Socialism is the National Socialism of the openly exhorted failure of knowledge. Bewitched by his own definition of the movement and assured of its superiority, Heidegger is not cynical in his opportunism. He is not even able to see his engagement as opportunistic. For Heidegger, the failure of knowledge, by virtue of its status as the limit towards which knowledge must strive in order to be what it is, cannot be anything other than the truth of knowledge and, ipso facto, of a political movement, whether in 1933 or 1966. The excess of "The Self-Assertion of the German University", and its equivocal defiance, is the excess by which it reaches beyond everything that lies unconcealed before knowledge in order to founder against the concealedness of necessity. In reaching beyond whatever lies unconcealed, "The Self-Assertion of the German University" reaches beyond an empirical National Socialism to the meta-National Socialism that is the truth of the movement. It is this meta-National Socialism that will be known when necessity itself is known and knowledge is truly knowledge of what is.

Heidegger's politics is a politics of concealedness. The conception of politics underlying Heidegger's engagement in 1933 is inseparable from the pre-eminence of failure before concealedness in his account of knowledge. If Heidegger, in his address, exhorts the university to genuine failure, it is because only in genuine failure does knowledge exchange the presumption of its "theoretical" attitude for the truth of its ground in beings. θεωρία, as the visibility of what is, comes to grief on the fate that is both essential and essentially concealed. With the proposition of the superior power of fate, Heidegger participates in the National Socialist demotion of the concepts of pure science and academic freedom.¹¹ But Heidegger's understanding of fate should not be identified with the National Socialist understanding of fate and the accompanying supremacy of the "political". The regime's complacent efforts to render the political visible suffice to indicate a distinction. The regime did not seek to founder on the invisibility of the political; instead, it sought to pass off the pervasiveness of its paraphernalia as the politicisation of the Gesellschaft of liberalism. The NSDAP was too positivistic in its understanding of fate. In the rectoral address, Aeschylus becomes the mouthpiece of Heidegger's own repeated criticism of the ontological presuppositions of the positivism of modern science. Founded in classical ontology's inability to think Being as other than that which is present and visible to the gaze of θεωρία, modern science does not see that Dasein cannot be seen.

Genuine failure, as it were, politicises knowledge, since it tears knowledge from the abstractness in which, forgetting its Being and thus forgetting itself, it believes it stands purely on itself. The event, and not the act, of genuine failure is the worlding of the world always tacitly presupposed by knowledge. As the historicity that is arrested when a being becomes visible in its presence and is known, fate cannot itself become visible. It cannot do so because it cannot reveal itself to knowledge, so long as knowledge, in a disavowal of failure, keeps within the limits of presence. Fate is the concealedness of the world that is the site of all political occurrences. It is the possibility of knowledge (objective genitive) and the impossibility of knowledge (subjective genitive). In order really to fail, knowledge must develop the highest defiance of the necessity (Notwendigkeit) of its failure. It must fail utterly and, that is to say, without guile. Following through its ambitions on the infinite, it must seek to encompass world even as knowledge of world is never a knowledge encompassing world, but rather a knowledge encompassed by world. Knowledge that merely counterfeits failure — that mistakes for example its wilful abdication of the concept for an immediate intuition of what is — retains the limitations of the “theoretical” attitude. In the conviction of the authority of its caprices, it secretly still believes it stands on itself. Such knowledge plays its voluntaristic irrationalism off against the rationalism of Descartes and his successors, but thereby only varies the Seinsvergessenheit of the metaphysics of subjectivity. Such knowledge is illusory because it cannot think the transcendence that is its own ground. Unable to think the worldliness of its Being, it is excluded from the truth of its essential politicality.

Heidegger’s political engagement can, therefore, be said to have been an engagement for the political, namely, for that which will come solely at the consummation and defeat of the knowledge of the metaphysics of subjectivity. Heidegger’s National Socialism was divided without remainder between the ancient saying of the Greeks on the impotence of knowledge and the future realization of the truth of this saying. In “The Self-Assertion of the German University”, the actuality of the movement resolves into the possibility of an authentic politics. And it is as the task of the German people that Heidegger puts forward this possibility:

But neither will anyone ask us whether we will it or do not will it when the spiritual strength of the West fails and the West starts to come apart at the seams, when this moribund pseudocivilization collapses into itself, pulling all forces into confusion and allowing them to suffocate in madness.

Whether such a thing occurs or does not occur, this depends solely on whether we as a historical-spiritual Volk will ourselves, still and again, or whether we will ourselves no longer. Each individual has a part in deciding this, even if, and precisely if, he seeks to evade this decision.

But it is our will that our Volk fulfill its historical mission.¹²

The historical task and possibility of the Germans is that they will themselves, not as individuals within the metaphysics of subjectivity, but as a people. According to the above quotation, only the German people's will to self-assertion stands in the way of the collapse of the West.¹³ But here the will is to be differentiated from the voluntarism and vulgar Nietzscheanism propagated by ideologues within the NSDAP. Precisely because Heidegger never disowned the rectoral address, the polemic against the will to power in his lectures from the late thirties and early forties cannot be interpreted as self-criticism. The German people's will to self-assertion is not its will to take on the role of the politician-aesthete among the masses of the globe. It is not its will to absolute subjectivity, but its will to the genuine failure of knowledge, and thus to the failure of will and its forgetfulness of world. Dasein's Being-in-the-world is to be recovered from oblivion.

That the self-assertion of a historical-spiritual people is better understood in terms of failure, than in terms of success, is the import of an earlier passage from the rectoral address:

This Volk is playing an active role in shaping its fate by placing its history into the openness of the overpowering might of all the world-shaping forces of human existence and by struggling ever anew to secure its spiritual world. Thus exposed to the extreme questionableness of its own existence, this Volk has the will to be a spiritual Volk.¹⁴

Understandably the Volk cannot win its spiritual world from a superior power. Through its defeat at the hands of the superior power, the Volk wrests its world from its own forgetfulness. The spiritual world that is secured is secured, not against the utmost questionability of a people's own Dasein, but, on the contrary, as this very questionability in the openness of the superior power of fate. The seeming paradox of Heidegger's rectoral address is that the German people comes to itself in its ruinous collision with fate. It comes to itself and knows itself as other than a being present-at-hand in coming to its ground in the unknowability of world.

As the university's will to knowledge is the means to this collision, it is the means to the eruption of the political from under the metaphysics of subjectivity. It is the university that founds a people. In favour of such a definition, Heidegger does not hesitate in rejecting the "negative" notion of academic freedom proper to an autonomous institution within the liberal state. Instead, in a sentence at once imperious and subservient, he contends: "The will to the essence of the German university is the will to science as the will to the historical spiritual mission of the German Volk as a Volk that knows itself in its state."¹⁵ The prospects of the National Socialist revolution are thereby tied up with the prospects of Heidegger's own rectorship. Already, in the 1928-9 lecture course Introduction to Philosophy, Heidegger speaks of the Führerschaft of the university and of its role in guiding the destiny of the people.¹⁶ The political self-assertion of the German people does not merely coincide with the self-assertion of knowledge, since the political, in the broadest sense as the site of the clearing of beings, is the truth towards which knowledge aspires.

In 1933 Heidegger did not want a “private” National Socialism. He did not want to come across merely as an opportunist and a fellow traveller. Born in the same year as Hitler, Heidegger alters even his moustache in his aggressive design to become Hitler’s doppelgänger. Under the cover of the euphoria of his commitment and the peculiarly dogmatic haziness of the official doctrine, Heidegger endeavoured to foist his “private” National Socialism on the new Germany as its thought. But when the attempt foundered and the regime disintegrated in obloquy and murder, Heidegger quickly redrew the boundaries of his “private” National Socialism.

In a letter from 15 December 1945 to the chairman of the university committee investigating political activities under the Nazis, Heidegger urges against taking his dealings with the regime, such as the telegram to Hitler, at face value:

When the word “Gleichschaltung” is used in the telegram, I intended it in the sense in which I also understood the name “National Socialism”. It was never my intention to deliver the university up to the doctrine of the party, but quite the reverse to try from within National Socialism and in relation to it to initiate a spiritual transformation.¹⁷

Accordingly, in the language of Heidegger’s unintentionally private National Socialism, the Gleichschaltung of Freiburg University is not the bringing of the university into line with the regime, but rather the bringing of the regime into line with the university under Heidegger’s leadership.

Whether a Gleichschaltung of any kind was needed is not a doubt that Heidegger could have entertained, given the conception of the political underlying his “private” National Socialism. Wanting the concealedness of fate to reveal itself, Heidegger wanted the German Volk to reveal itself. The Volk was to be the consequence of Gleichschaltung, rather than that which was to be brought into line. All efforts were to be directed towards the ontological mission of the German people, since it is on a fulfilment of this mission that the knowledge of the truth of beings depends. Heidegger's vision in the rectoral address is of the university with which the state has been brought into line and mobilized for the highest of all tasks. The concealment of fate is to be defied, so that the truth of the historicity of Dasein might be understood in its originary character. In other words, and in the language of the regime, the truth of the Volk is to be placed above the truth of the abstract subject.

With regard to Heidegger's veritable totalitarianism of the university, the rectoral address is timelier in 1933 than it would have been in 1966. But whereas the totalitarianism of the Hitlerian dictatorship sought the liquidation of the abstract subject by ultimatum, and on account of such decisionism was thus unable to break with the metaphysics of subjectivity, Heidegger, in 1933, advances an utterly singular strategy of epistemological exhaustion. Heidegger's "private" National Socialism was to be the National Socialism at least capable of attempting to carry out its programme of politicisation, since it remained considerably more faithful to the movement's distinction between the political and the subject. As the foundations of the subject are, for Heidegger, philosophical, it is only by a painstaking, philosophical confrontation with these foundations that the subject might be overcome and the political inaugurated. If Heidegger intimates to Hitler in his telegram that he is going too fast, he thereby voices nothing but his assessment of the movement as a whole.

What is frequently overlooked in "The Self-Assertion of the German University" is this sobriety. The afflatus of Heidegger's "private" National Socialism blows very coolly on the triumphalist reckoning that the revolution had already taken place. Having implied that the revolution against liberalism and the metaphysics of subjectivity rests with the failure of knowledge, Heidegger cautions:

If, however, the Greeks needed three centuries just to put the question of what knowledge is on the proper footing and on the secure path, then we certainly cannot think that the elucidation and unfolding of the essence of the German university can occur in the present or coming semester.¹⁸

The German university, which is to demand more of itself than simply the question of what knowledge is, needs time. Through dispensing with the development of knowledge's highest defiance, a revolution by fiat amounts solely to a variation of the terms laid down in the metaphysics of subjectivity. The National Socialism of Hitler (if such a locution can be permitted for the moment) was unequal to the task of overcoming the subject, since the domain of the subject must first be accurately delimited before it can be overcome.

For Heidegger, the revolution has, first and foremost, to be an enquiry into the foundations of knowledge and the ontological presuppositions of the epistemological subject. Translated as "knowledge", the τεχνη of Aeschylus' verse thus signifies in 1933 something quite different from the manipulative ingenuity of advanced industrial societies by which Heidegger would later understand technicism. In "The Self-Assertion of the German University", τεχνη is characterized by its defiance of the superior power of fate, rather than by any obliviousness to fate. τεχνη does not aspire to the mastery of material, but to the impossible illumination of its own blind necessity, to the unconcealedness of what is essentially concealed in its difference from the present-at-hand. To borrow more than an image from What Is A Thing?, τεχνη seeks to jump over its own shadow.¹⁹ The necessity that is the unacknowledged ground of the theoretical attitude is, in unavailing defiance of this definition, to become the object of the theoretical attitude. In 1933, Heidegger accordingly repeats speculative idealism's project of absolute knowledge precisely in order to come up to its failure. He endeavours to seize hold of the finitude of knowledge, where Hegel jumped away from it into the metaphysical sun of the dialectic. Heidegger's "private" National Socialism, in one respect and in contrast to the Blut und Boden mysticism of the regime, wants to be more Hegelian than Hegel, since it wants to think rigorously the finitude of world that Hegel ultimately evaded through its conceptualisation. And if it wants to be more Hegelian than Hegel, it is nonetheless so as to have done with Hegel. Heidegger's longstanding desire to outdo Hegel in sobriety complements his derision for the subaltern antics of irrationalism. Both can be derived from his appraisal of the scope of metaphysics and the corresponding magnitude of the exclusively philosophical task of its destruction. As it is formulated in Heidegger's "private" National Socialism, the revolution is the self-assertion of sobriety within metaphysics.

Sobriety, rather than the intoxication of blood, is Heidegger's response to the metaphysics of subjectivity. The idea of a "folkish" science (völkische Wissenschaft) that, under National Socialism, circulated as the repressed truth of the cosmopolitan notion of science lacked sobriety and the stringent enquiry into the foundations of knowledge. It could scarcely hope to pass off its irrationalism — by which it fell short even of the cosmopolitanism of the concept, and thus avoided a confrontation with the concept — as the understanding of world before which the concept falls short. In such a "folkish" science, knowledge does not so much fail as hold itself aloof. It cannot "really" fail because it cannot put its own determinacy in question. Knowledge is accepted as knowledge only inasmuch as it is an expression of the German Volk.²⁰ The German Volk has become the truth of the cosmopolitan notion of science, but only in the sense that it has arbitrarily replaced it.

The embarrassment in which the various Aryan sciences ignominiously expired cannot be said to possess in Heidegger's rectoral address its unambiguous apology before the fact. In one respect, the failure of these sciences has little in common with Heidegger's understanding of failure. The object of defiance in "The Self-Assertion of the German University" is not the global community of scientists, but necessity — not the liberal notion of science, but its Un-thought. When Heidegger in 1933 uses the term "folkish science", it is not to denote a contraction in the range of the liberal notion of science as though a science is "folkish", i.e. German, only to the extent that it forfeits its claims to validity outside an identifiable people. Such a relativistic doctrine of science is alien both to Heidegger and National Socialism. Five months after the rectoral address Heidegger states in Leipzig:

We have renounced the idolatry of a rootless and impotent thinking. We behold the end of its servile philosophy. We are convinced that the luminous rigour and the befitting confidence of the inexorable and simple questioning concerning the essence of Being are returning. The originary courage either to grow or to shatter thereon in the confrontation with that which is constitutes the innermost impetus of the questioning of a folkish science.²¹

Here "folkish" qualifies a science not in the restriction of its range, but rather in the enhancement of its scientificity. It is the science that endeavours to think that rootedness in a historical world disavowed, but nonetheless presupposed, by the internationalism of the liberal notion of science. It brings its sobriety to bear on the repressed of the liberal notion of science and defies its repression. That which Heidegger names "necessity" (Notwendigkeit) in the rectoral address is the originary in its necessity. It is that which is always presupposed and always forgotten in a knowledge that fixes upon beings, but never strictly upon the world in which beings first appear.

A “folkish” science, inasmuch as it more than pretends to seek to be the truth of the liberal notion of science, must make itself a party to the latter at the scene of its determination through the forgetting of world. And as it is through the concept that the liberal notion of science forgets world, recoiling from its rootedness into the a-historical repeatability in presence with which it equates knowledge, it is only by holding to the concept, and to the violence of its retreat, that a science might still confront its world and become the truth of its own “folkishness”. A “folkish” science, therefore, dares not renounce the concept. One year after the rectoral address, in the lecture course Logic as the Question Concerning the Essence of Language, Heidegger declares:

What is at stake is the overcoming of the definition of the concept as a husk. Consistent with this is not the deposing of the concept, but rather the higher necessity of conceptual questioning.²²

For Heidegger, the romantic objection to the lifelessness of the concept is itself objectionable. Deposing the concept in favour of an immediate intuition of what is does not solve the problem presented by the concept’s lifelessness. The absolute and voluntaristic subjectivity that convinces itself of its ability to issue binding decrees on the concept perpetuates the abstraction from world for which the concept is reproached. Wherever the concept is said to have been deposed, the forgetfulness of world rather lords it all the more peremptorily in the absence of proper criticism. A truly “folkish” science does not begin with the Volk in the manner of a perspective or as the guarantor of its immediate intuitions. Instead, only at the very end does it come to its people as the world that reveals itself in its concealedness in the genuine failure of knowledge.

What a “folkish” science awaits from the concept is the birth of the Volk that would be thought’s own. This people would be the world as it has always eluded thought and preceded it as its ground. Understood in its irreducibility to the metaphysics of subjectivity, the people of a truly “folkish” science is not identifiable by physical properties or cultural practices, but is rather the world as the broadest dimension of the political. Such a people is the transcendence of Being-with-one-another and can thus never fully reveal itself in the presence of knowledge. Knowledge, in its metaphysical determination, has always proceeded from an ignorance of the people. The loyalty of Heidegger’s “folkish” science to the concept is necessarily a tactical loyalty, since what this science sets out to know with the concept is that which is not conceptualisable because it is not knowable within the limits of presence. A “folkish” science must fail in its conceptualisation of the Volk. It awaits from its failure an unrecognizable people. Heidegger’s “folkish” science is the science of the absurdity of German nationalism, because it is the science of the reserve of the world of the Volk, of that which is never present-at-hand. As such, it has the most to gain from the failure of nationalism and from the rebuff to the latter’s claims on the world of the Volk. Spying its chance in a nation that mistakes its integration in a people-subject for the uprising of world, Heidegger’s “folkish” science cynically incites this nationalism to grasp fate itself in order that it might fail all the more thoughtfully. A “folkish” science is essentially opportunistic. It always seeks to outwit nationalism, but in the end it is perhaps too clever: on account of its philosophical sophistication it is taken for the truth of what it attempted to exploit. Contributing to the Gleichschaltung of the German nation under Hitler, Heidegger sees beyond the unification of the masses in a people-subject to the collision of this people-subject with necessity. Heidegger’s extreme, yet nonetheless tactical, nationalism merges with an anti-nationalism. But as the one sober participant at the saturnalia of German nationalism, it is Heidegger after the war who will be asked for an explanation.

Given the meta-National Socialism of “The Self-Assertion of the German University”, it would be inexact and therefore misleading to ascribe Heidegger’s resignation of the rectorship in April 1934 to his disillusionment with the regime as such. In and for itself, the regime was not the object of his engagement. Strictly speaking, Heidegger's disillusionment was with the regime's amenability to his leadership. That which was never expected to turn out well had within a year proved itself intractable to an unfolding of the philosophical possibilities of its inevitable failure: Hitler was no more Heidegger's puppet than he had been Papen's. In his letter of 15 December, 1945, defending to the university what he could of his rectorate, Heidegger scrambles to muster a still broader appearance of naïvety:

Already in 1933-4 I stood in the same opposition to the National Socialist Weltanschauung teachings. I was, however, then of the belief that the movement could be led spiritually down other paths and considered this attempt compatible with the social and general political tendencies of the movement. I believed that, after assuming in 1933 responsibility for the entire people, Hitler would rise above the party and its doctrine and that everything would come together on the basis of a renewal and rallying to a responsibility for the West. This belief was an error: I recognised it as such from the events of 30 June 1934.²³

On what grounds could Heidegger have believed that Hitler was destined to undergo a change of heart after seizing power in January 1933? Such credulity verges on the implausible. That many other adherents of the regime expressed a similar credulity does not render Heidegger's statement any more plausible: it rather indicates the conventionality of his defence. And if, by his reference to 30 June, 1934, Heidegger is implying that his engagement was an innocent dream from which he was awakened only by the bloodbath of the Night of the Long Knives, then the SA itself would have had to have been known in its time as something other than organized thuggery. In his post-war apologetics Heidegger frequently overreaches himself. As much as its distance from the regime must not be overlooked, Heidegger's meta-National Socialism cannot be converted into a position of resistance.

After 1934 Heidegger is considerably more wary of nationalism's prospects of failure. The failure that is quickly seen to lie beyond the grasp of National Socialism now becomes the affair of poetry. In this respect, Heidegger's commentary from 1939 on Hölderlin's poem "Wie wenn am Feiertage..." reads as an epilogue to "The Self-Assertion of the German University", and as a repudiation of its opportunism. The defiance to which the university and the state as a whole are admonished in the rectoral address is, in the later text, the duty of the poet. Aligning "the Open" of Hölderlin with that which he terms "world"²⁴, Heidegger arguably retains the same understanding of the concealedness of the superior power:

The open mediates the connections between all actual things. These latter are constituted only because of such mediation, and are therefore mediated. What is mediated in that way only is by virtue of mediatedness. Thus, mediatedness must be present in all. The open itself, however, though it first gives the region for all belonging-to and –with each other, does not arise from any mediation. The open itself is the immediate. Nothing mediated, be it a god or a man, is ever capable of directly attaining the immediate.²⁵

The Open mediates and, by virtue of its mediating, is that which itself cannot be mediated. Like necessity, it is at once immediate and intangible. Through its immediacy, the Open humbles gods and human beings in their ambition to mediate it. In the face of the impossibility of mediation, the poets nonetheless cannot resign themselves: “The poets must leave to the immediate its immediacy, and yet also take upon themselves its mediation as the unique.”²⁶ And if the poets are able to mediate the immediate, the success of this defiance of their limitations does not fall to their credit:

When the grasping and offering of their hands is permeated by a “pure heart,” these poets are capable of the task that has been entrusted to them. [...] The “pure heart” is not meant here in a “moralistic” sense. This phrase means one kind of relation, and one manner of correspondence to “all-present” nature.²⁷

The “pure heart” is not a property of the poets. It names their relation of correspondence to “omnipresent” Nature. In this commentary on Hölderlin, where the impossible mediation of the immediate is said to begin at the point of the poets’ reconciliation with the Open (or omnipresent Nature), the defiance that is to fail before fate in the rectoral address is still discernible. The agonistics of the earlier taxonomy, however, are missing. In place of the violent rupture between the theoretical attitude and necessity, there is not even so much as a transition from the poet to omnipresent Nature, since it is only within the latter that the poet, for Heidegger, truly becomes a poet. This tranquillity in the 1939 text does not follow from any intervening peace with the subject, because the poet has nothing in common with the theoretical attitude’s abstraction from world. Heidegger’s tranquillity is more calculating than resigned. In 1933, on the basis of his anti-subjectivism and its accompanying Manicheism, Heidegger is able to make concessions to a voluntaristic political movement with an opportunist’s eye to its other side. Yet the beyond to which he aspires remains — by the logic of reversal he would later expound in his lectures on Nietzsche — determined by the metaphysics of subjectivity. With time, Heidegger's wariness of nationalism's prospects of failure gives way to a wariness of failure's prospects. Where early Heidegger seemingly wishes to push everything to its point of crisis, late Heidegger will no longer be prepared to break even a jug.²⁸

Heidegger's disengagement with the regime has to be thought through as a disengagement with his own meta-National Socialism. As National Socialism itself was not the object of his engagement, it often seems that Heidegger is closer to the movement after 1934 than he ever was during his rectorship. A virulent suspicion of the ontic, for instance, renders early Heidegger proof against kitsch. With the interrogation of this suspicion's entanglement in the metaphysics of subjectivity, there emerges in later texts a susceptibility to the charms of Bodenständigkeit painfully redolent of the idylls of Nazi literature.

In dissolving the agonistic taxonomy of his rectoral address, Heidegger dissolves precisely that which, in 1937, Clemens August Hoberg finds incompatible with National Socialism. At the start of his polemic against Heidegger, Hoberg declares that his objections issue "not from a philosophical system, but rather from the simple, straightforward attitude of a young German"²⁹; in short, that it is his intention to play misère. Reducing the passage on failure in the rectoral address to a personal admission of the author³⁰, Hoberg proceeds to situate National Socialism in that same relaxation of the exclusive disjunction towards which Heidegger likewise directs his thinking after 1934. For Hoberg, National Socialism is not itself a crisis:

The decisive difference between Heidegger and us consists in the fact that, in everyday life, we create and make ourselves felt, rather than lose ourselves in mere bustle. So long as we are active in the work assigned to us, Heideggerian dread cannot possibly rise up in us and compel everything to appear for us in its nullity.³¹

The work stands between self-absorbed bustle and the Nothing, and thus against the volatility of their alternation. What might further determine the work is, for Hoberg's purposes, superfluous information. For Hoberg, the National Socialist revolution resolves the Heideggerian "dilemma" of triviality and dread. By assigning work, Hitler showed himself to be the answer to the Manicheism of early Heidegger. On the strength of Hoberg's polemic, it could be contended that National Socialism comes to the jargon of authenticity, and its bathos of unquestioning obedience, before Heidegger and in opposition to him. Having sought to outwit the movement, Heidegger thus renounces the dualism of his meta-National Socialism only to find himself ostensibly recuperated.

After the war, it is similarly the very terms on which he withdrew from his engagement that prevent Heidegger from dedicating himself to his rehabilitation. Certainly, for many, Heidegger never offered a satisfactory statement of repentance, but then no mere statement of repentance could have been commensurate with the allegiance pledged to a genocidal regime. Complicity with National Socialism becomes, on account of the latter's enormity, effectively irrevocable. In Heidegger's case, however, the statement of repentance was withheld less out of shame over its inadequacy than out of shamelessness. There is no question that Heidegger suffered deeply the ignominy of this shamelessness³², but he was bound to it as his defence against National Socialism. To concede responsibility, which, without offence to the dead and the tortured, could not have been other than to concede an absolute responsibility, would only have been possible on the basis of the absolute subject. And yet in refusing responsibility, Heidegger could not but appear to invoke the independence of the absolute subject from ethical norms. This appearance of absolute subjectivity derives, ironically, from Heidegger's equanimity before the metaphysics of subjectivity. The philosophical ambition of this equanimity, given its timing, risks being overlooked.

In 1933 Heidegger joined the NSDAP out of a philosophically motivated shame, and his inaugural address as rector turns upon the hope of a failure of the theoretical subject. As an obstacle to the truth of that which is, this subject is consumed with shame of itself and works towards the fulfillment by which it is not entrenched, but overcome. In Heidegger's commentary on the verse by Aeschylus, the self-consciously supernumerary masses that gladly received from fascism, first, ideological repatriation and then death are thus transfigured without being saved from themselves. The epistemological failure that is offered the theoretical attitude is not an offer by means of which the notion of the subject could be saved.

Even if the address was immediately criticized for its "private" National Socialism, insofar as it demoted the subject it was utterly conventional. To be sure, National Socialism did not inaugurate the prevailing mistrust of the terms of liberalism. The parliamentary successes of the various fascist movements are incomprehensible without the pervasiveness, as well as pre-existence, of a dissatisfaction with the spurious autonomy of the subject. The politician-aesthete only creates a people in conspiracy with the ashamed, and the theatricals of the cult of personality owed their effect perhaps less to innovations in the art of propaganda, than to the humiliation of the subject that was staged in their manipulateness. National Socialism arrived at a concept of human material by which it might account for, and thus seem to get the better of, the waves of fellow travellers attracted by the despotism of its doctrinal vacuity, rather than by the doctrines themselves. Accordingly, to interpret Heidegger as a fellow traveller does not position him on the periphery of National Socialism, since the centre of the movement was not a catechism or a programme, but rather its appeal as an occasion for self-effacement. Under National Socialism, the liberal myth of the autonomous subject is vociferously condemned and carried notwithstanding to its point of utmost fraudulence. The subject that, out of weariness with itself and shame, effaces itself in the movement clings, nonetheless, to the capriciousness with which it chose the vehicle of its effacement, thereby persuading itself of its independence even in the midst of degradations. With respect to overcoming the abstraction of the subject and removing the possibility of private National Socialisms, the movement miscarried in its Gleichschaltung. From this foundering of its totalitarianism, it nevertheless knew how to draw still greater benefits. Fascism in general fell in with the vanity of the autonomous subject, correctly sensing behind its plea for a liberation from itself the desire for an “adventure” that would no longer pull back before madness and death. Opportunism was therefore involved on both sides. Heidegger was not the only fellow traveller willing to consider his or her engagement with the NSDAP as an exchange between independent parties. A delimitation of the phenomenon of fascism has in the end to emphasise what was not “there” — that vacuity in which a multilateral opportunism could have free play and the abstract subject could realize itself in desperation.³³

In his 1930 text The Worker, Ernst Jünger, heralds the nihilism that, in Heidegger’s judgement, was subsequently manifested under National Socialism. Notwithstanding his contempt for Hitler, Jünger provides an insight into the grounds of fascism by detailing conditions of possibility for an engagement with an authoritarian mass movement. As much as he stresses the irrelevance of the subject for the Gestalt of the Worker, Jünger only arouses the suspicion that this declaration of irrelevance is the half-hearted disguise of an absolute subjectivity. In passing from the individual human being to the Gestalt of the Worker, Jünger does not overcome the subject. Instead, he discovers that configuration of the subject in which its abstraction and autonomy could escape the commonly perceived debunking of the liberal subject. The myth of the subject, which a lone individual cannot maintain in the face of the reality of technical civilization, is to find its defence in the unified masses. Jünger’s Worker is the subject that can work and still maintain its abstraction as a subject. Rather than working on account of any subordination to circumstances, it works because it lies in its declaimed transcendental definition as the Worker to work. Why the Worker should periodically have to embark on war for the purpose of destroying what it has produced — and as a Worker it does not do anything else but produce — cannot be explained without admitting that the product threatens the reactively transcendental definition of the Worker. It threatens the Worker with a return to a Marxist-Hegelian recognition of its own mediation in the product.

In comparison with the rectoral address, the sleight of hand in Jünger's "overcoming" of the subject is risibly clumsy. Through the absoluteness with which he distinguishes knowledge and necessity in 1933, Heidegger nonetheless seeks from necessity a revolution in which the subject might also retain its externality, even if only in being swept aside. The anti-liberalism that expresses itself in shame over the subject is still too liberal. It continues to forget world as the clearing of beings, because it does not make it as far as the world in which the subject also has its Being for itself. Heidegger's shamelessness after the war, his appearance as an unrepentant Nazi, is not only his disavowal of the grounds of his engagement with the regime, but also a manifestation of the rigorous anti-liberalism that remained out of fascism's reach.

"The Self-Assertion of the German University" is, in one respect, a liberal text. Defining itself by its opposition to liberalism, it renounces the possibility of developing an anti-liberalism that would not at once be dialectically reappropriated. It wants to think the superior power of necessity through the failure of the theoretical attitude and thus wants to think necessity in its absence from the knowledge yielding itself to the theoretical attitude. Necessity, which had been forgotten by the autonomous subject of liberalism, is to take its revenge without ceasing to be forgotten. Instead of remembering its world, the subject shatters on the emergence of its world that is properly a non-emergence. The subject comes to grief on the severity with which world withholds itself from that which is present (das Anwesende). On the one hand, world, as that which, for Heidegger, is not present because it is the presencing (Anwesenung) of that which is present, cannot be sufficiently distinguished from that which is present. Its distinctness, on the other hand, cannot be made distinct, since as the presencing of beings in the light of knowledge, world is the possibility and domain of distinctions. In 1933, Heidegger's choice within this dilemma — and the crux of his inverted liberalism — is to insist on the distinctness and to think the presencing of world by itself as absence. "The Self-Assertion of the German University" concentrates on the forgetfulness in the forgetfulness of Being and thus concentrates on the philosophical tradition's relation to Being, rather than, as it were, on Being itself. That which is forgotten by the subject is to be remembered as forgotten, and thereby remembered in a distinctness alien to Being as such. The theoretical subject, in its shame, is not so much to heed the voice of conscience as it is analysed in §§54–60 of Being and Time, as provoke its wrath. The subject is not called back to the authenticity of its Being-in-the-world and thus to the transcendence by which Dasein undecidably differentiates itself from that which is present. Instead, the subject suffers defeat for the sake of the "clarity" of the ontological difference.

Heidegger's anti-subjectivism in 1933 was intended to contest classical ontology's understanding of Being as presence. This contestation, in the very radicality with which it ventured to think absence and to seize hold of it in its distinctness, solidified into being simply the complement of the Seinsvergessenheit of classical ontology. As such, it was an "error" — one, however, that can be recognised but not rectified. The error can only be committed differently: in late Heidegger it appears in the serenity before classical ontology that, by comparison, refrains ab ovo from a contestation. If, in 1966, Heidegger declares that he would repeat the rectoral address with a still greater vehemence, it is more with a regard to the necessity of thinking through its error than out of a protectiveness for any of its discernible truths. It is the inevitability of the error of not thinking Being as such that is, for late Heidegger, thought's innermost provocation.

In 1933, Heidegger's error in relation to classical ontology is that he endeavours to overcome it by a reversal. Heidegger's concomitant error in relation to National Socialism is that, without however any unavailability, he chooses not to foresee how the movement would quash a contestation of classical ontology. National Socialism failed, but its failure was not the failure of knowledge exhorted in the rectoral address. From the overtaxing of the regime's paranoiac classifications and monitoring of the social field, Heidegger was to await in vain the presencing of that which is present, the revelation of the Being of beings in its precedence to governmental control. Even in its failure, National Socialism refused to allow the question of Being to become the overt and pervasive question of Germany. It ensured that Dasein would either quickly find itself in its everydayness in the task of the reconstruction of an occupied Germany or not find itself in death. World was not permitted to light up in the failure of the regime, since the question of the state, of its relation to its context, was not revived in response to the collapse of the National Socialist dictatorship, but settled in advance by the occupying powers. A Germany outside the control of a state, and thus outside the understanding of Being as presence fundamental to control, was not something to which either the Nazis or the Allies aspired. In a sense, the dictatorship was a failure of failure and, on that account, it was perhaps the exemplary system of control. Having in 1933 wagered on the worlding of the world in the regime's failure, Heidegger after the war can only rue his opportunistic hopes for an exposure of the ontological foundations of control.

Heidegger's engagement with National Socialism rests on a misprojection. In Hitler's seizure of power he insanely managed to see the chance of a fundamental redefinition of the political. The ontology presupposed in the classical understanding of the polis was to be contested by the simultaneous emergence and non-emergence of the German Volk. Heidegger wants to stand the polis on its head and to ground the new Germany in concealedness. To the Greek polis of the full visibility of the glorious deed, of the deliverance from anonymity and the establishment in the lasting fame of presence, Heidegger opposes the polis that, by its failure to defend rigorously its claim to self-groundedness, lies open to Being in its essential withdrawal. Heidegger's polis is the polis that knows its own essential unknowability. It is the polis whose self-knowledge reaches the point of the failure of knowledge. Implicit in the rectoral address, and therefore unobtrusive in its absurdity, is the conception of a National Socialism that would reach beyond the controllability of beings — their recognisability in presence as the bearers of such and such properties, and thus their trackability — to their truth in the transcendence of Being. The polis of the recollection of Being is the polis of concealment, rather than of control. It is without glory but not privatively. In An Introduction to Metaphysics, Heidegger sets forth the relations between the Greek notion of fame and the understanding of Being as presence:

To glorify, to attribute regard to, and disclose regard means in Greek: to place in the light and thus endow with permanence, being. For the Greeks glory was not something additional which one might or might not obtain; it was the mode of the highest being. For moderns glory has long been nothing more than celebrity and as such a highly dubious affair, an acquisition tossed about and distributed by the newspapers and the radio — almost the opposite of being.³⁴

Heidegger does not disparage the celebrity of radio and newsprint simply out of nostalgia for the Greek notion of glory. Greek glory is here suggested only to be preferable.³⁵

Heidegger dismisses celebrity as almost the opposite of Being: the understanding of Being as presence is inherited without being appropriated, let alone contested in a questioning concerning the essence of Being. If Heidegger, in 1933, evokes a tragic conception of the polis as a whole and an accordingly anonymous catastrophe before necessity, it is because the question of Being can only be raised anew by putting glory itself into question. The aim of the Gleichschaltung under Hitler was not to bring about the unity of the public realm and its reformation as the site of the full visibility of the glorious deed. Instead, its aim, according to Heidegger, was the mobilisation of the masses for the knowledge of the concealment at the heart of unconcealment, of the inglorious essence of glory. Heidegger's polis is to ask more of itself than glory, because it is to ask after that which is never merely present. Raising the question of Being, this other polis endeavours to think Dasein in its uncontrollability. Control is to be overcome for the sake, not of a pacifist utopia, but of the violence of time tearing identity away from itself in presence. The Being of Dasein, which for Heidegger is temporality, is no longer to go unthought. In glory's understanding of Being as presence the debasement of Dasein has its inconspicuous, and thus insidious, beginnings. From the glorious deed of the Greek polis a genealogical line can be traced down to the breeding programmes dear to National Socialism. Heidegger, in the rectoral address, thus goads Hitler to failure, so that Dasein might be recovered for its world from the derivative certainty of self-groundedness. Within the new regime's prospects of failure, Heidegger believes he makes out, if there alone, an understanding of the transcendence of Dasein at variance with the espoused biologism. Out of an attention to failure, the praiseworthy deed, in which Aristotle situates the causa finalis for the institution of the *polis*³⁶, comes under a suspicion that is likewise the most arrant gullibility with respect to the truth of the failure in store for Nazi Germany.

As much as National Socialism failed, it did not thereby usher in the era of Dasein's authenticity. The understanding of Being as presence, in which the glorious deed enjoyed its recognisability and recognisability deployed itself as state control, did not yield to an understanding of the transcendence of Dasein. Dasein was delivered up to death and the administrative measures of the occupying powers, since the regime refused to be survived by its failure. Not unlike Heidegger, but out of hypochondria rather than opportunism, it ultimately viewed its failure as its work and achievement. Once the regime could no longer appropriate its own failures, it strove instead to assimilate itself to the catastrophe that was befalling it. National Socialism would make this disaster its own by contributing to it. As it had created everything, everything would have to accompany it in its destruction. The fatherland that the regime had invented as a sponge for surplus labour was not to remain behind. In the name of national defence, the NSDAP had preached rearmament and courted military disaster for the purpose of an immediate economic remedy. In the event, the regime was not prepared to defend its ad hoc fatherland by a surrender on conditions. National Socialism was state suicide. It is by this aspect that Deleuze and Guattari, following Virilio, distinguish it from Stalinism:

Unlike the totalitarian State, which does its utmost to seal all possible lines of flight, fascism is constructed on an intense line of flight, which it transforms into a line of pure destruction and abolition. It is curious that from the very beginning the Nazis announced to Germany what they were bringing: at once wedding bells and death, including their own death, and the death of the Germans.³⁷

The Nazi regime knew how to turn away from the understanding of Being as presence, but only by carrying all beings with it into a black hole. From the insight into its own unviability as an enduring state it grasped that if it was to prove its control over life and death, it had to do so as quickly as possible through destruction. National Socialism cannot be said to have been an anti-state simply because it was suicidal. It was rather the grotesque parody of a state, a state that runs fast. The war will thus not have been over the question of the state as such, but over its tempo, as Deleuze and Guattari suggest:

Conversely, if capitalism came to consider the fascist experience as catastrophic, if it preferred to ally itself with Stalinist totalitarianism, which from its point of view was much more sensible and manageable, it was because the segmentarity and centralization of the latter was more classical and less fluid.³⁸

If dissolution was finally perceived by capitalism as the real danger, it was not because it announced the re-emergence of the stateless and borderless Germany of literary myth. No Romantic Volk of poets and thinkers was about to raise the question of Being against the very possibility of control. The collapse of the Hitlerian regime was the dissolution of a state apparatus too “Western”, and hence too deeply embedded in the social body, to be dismantled other than through catastrophe.³⁹ National Socialism did not go quietly. It was not prepared for the State to retreat to a minimal threshold of control, let alone to yield to the transcendence of Being-with-one-another. Where societies without a state have been observed to hold a festival to sacrifice the stockpile resulting from periods of surplus, rather than allow it to mount an invitation to exclusive ownership and thereby to tyranny, the Hitlerian dictatorship went further. Consistent with its reified notion of humanity, it threw on the bonfire of its Walpurgisnacht its stockpile of peoples. The problem, not of the state as such, but of overproduction, which had arisen from an improvised solution to the problem of surplus labour, was ruthlessly solved through waste.⁴⁰

That Heidegger, in 1933, could have harboured any expectations of a survival from the failure of the Western state is perhaps in the end less a sign of his naïvety than of his desperation. It may have been that, with none of the confidence that follows from a scrupulous assessment of existing conditions, Heidegger joined the NSDAP, doing so on the off-chance that the course of the movement might be directed towards the failure in which Dasein would be recovered for its world. Inasmuch as the NSDAP was a German nationalist movement, its course, in Heidegger's eyes, was already set for the failure of knowledge in the encounter with the truth of the Volk. It was a matter of maintaining its course. However unfathomable Heidegger's engagement was with regard to the divide between his conception of humanity and the regime's, it was not arbitrary. Heidegger mistook the fragility of National Socialism for the weak point in the hegemony of reification, and he chose its insanity over the insanity of doing nothing. No doubt the choice was for Heidegger, in his cruder sympathies, a little too easy. The object of his choice, moreover, did not simply perpetuate the nihilism of the reification of humanity, but dedicated itself to its aggravation.

As the regime had no intention of playing the role of the weakest link, it thus ignored the cues Heidegger was to keep repeating in the mid thirties. With the resignation of the rectorship, Heidegger does not abandon the question of the political. The polis of the recollection of Being, for whose sake Heidegger sought to get the better of National Socialism, remains arguably the fundamental concern in the subsequent lectures on art. In these lectures it stands forth all the more clearly in the absence of concessions to the regime. As a result, what Heidegger wanted in 1933 gains in comprehensibility, if also in incredibility. In the 1934-5 lecture course Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein", Heidegger names the creator of the state alongside the poet and the thinker as those who ground the historical Dasein of a people.⁴¹ But the equation is not to be read as a flatterer's revision of Hegel's subordination of the state to art and philosophy. The blandishment is much more an admonition to ground the state that has never yet been grounded, since the state can only truly be grounded, is only truly originary, if it is grounded — like poetry and thought — beyond presence in the originarity of Dasein's authentic understanding of Being. In "The Origin of the Work of Art", Heidegger's introduction of the act that founds a state as a further site of the event of truth has to be interpreted similarly.⁴² He is not referring to the historiographically recorded coup d'état of three years earlier, but to the state that is founded as such because it is founded with its world in the clearing of beings in the event of truth. National Socialism's only response to these proposals for a polis of Being was a hardening of the understanding of Being as presence and an intensification of control through the erection of an apparatus of terror.

Heidegger's intimations of a polis of Being in the rectoral address are exposed to misinterpretation through contiguous passages. "The Self-Assertion of the German University" does not always abstain from employing the motifs of the NSDAP. But then nor does it restrict itself to bare citation. Unlike other, less heterodox texts from his term as rector, Heidegger did not disown the address. He did not disown it, just as he did not disown his "private" National Socialism. The rectoral address is, for Heidegger, the point of continuity between his writings before and after 1933. As such, it is the most overt expression of that "private" National Socialism which arguably is to be discerned elsewhere in his work. This "private" National Socialism is the politics of the failure of knowledge, of the truth that confers itself as the punishment of the defiance of concealedness. In his engagement with the Nazi regime, Heidegger did not interrupt the thinking on the essence of truth that runs through his writings of the thirties. What Heidegger all too cursorily sets out in the commentary on Aeschylus in the rectoral address can thus be read in conjunction with his more expansive treatments. Indeed, it must be read in this manner if the radicality of his other understanding of the political is to be ascertained.

In speaking of a defiance of concealedness in the rectoral address, Heidegger is not referring to knowledge's quantitative progression into the unknown. Concealedness is not to retreat before knowledge, but is itself to become the matter of knowledge. Concealedness is to reveal itself as concealedness and thereby confer on knowledge the truth of beings. In his 1931-2 lecture course On the Essence of Truth: Plato's Parable of the Cave and Theaetetus, Heidegger contends that the Greek definition of truth rests on an evasion of the task of a knowledge of concealedness:

The signification of Being in the sense of presence is the reason that ἀληθεια (unconcealment) is ground down to mere presence-at-hand (not gone), and concealment correspondingly to mere being-gone. This means however: the classical understanding of Being prevents the already dawning foundational experience of the concealment of beings from being able, at its origin, to unfold itself in its proper depth.⁴³

Concealedness, according to this early reflection on the dilemma of any exposition of the ontological difference, is neither present nor absent. For classical ontology, concealedness is, by contrast, the condition of that which is not present. Whatever does not stand determinate in the light of knowledge is, for classical ontology, nonetheless able, inasmuch as it is, to stand in the light of knowledge — the obstacles to a being's unconcealedness are extrinsic to what it is in itself. Concealedness thus does not become the occasion of a questioning of the understanding of Being as presence, because it is subordinated to presence and defined negatively by it as absence. Never permitted to confront knowledge with that which essentially cannot stand in its light, with that which is absent even as it is present, concealedness does not reveal itself as concealedness to classical ontology.

Classical ontology does not ask after the secret of concealedness, which for Heidegger is the being that he names Dasein. It shies away from a meditation on its uncanniness such as that which Heidegger reads in Greek tragedy. In his lectures on Hölderlin's hymn "Der Ister", Heidegger addresses the chorus from Antigone in order to confront the ontological exception that is the human being:

Uncanniness does not first arise as a consequence of humankind; rather, humankind emerges from uncanniness and remains within it — looms out of it and stirs within it. The uncanny itself is what looms forth in the essence of human beings and is that which stirs in all stirring and arousal: that which presences and at the same time absences.⁴⁴

The uncanniness of Dasein is its undecidability with respect to the understanding of Being as presence. As the ecstases of originary temporality, Dasein essentially conceals itself from the presence in which knowledge stands fixed. Dasein conceals itself from the knowledge that only comes to itself by falling away from a knowledge of the temporality from which its presence is derived. Knowledge can thus only fail in its defiance of the superior power of concealedness and, in its failure, it must open up presence to the truth of Dasein. Only in that failure of knowledge which is likewise a failure of presence will an authentic understanding of humanity arise. Within such an understanding, the transcendence of Being-with-one-another at the basis of the polis would no longer be reduced to the controllable identity of the subjects of a state. The autonomy of the subject, the abstraction by which it won to the independence that was likewise and still more its controllability, is exchanged for the anarchy of time.

In the failure of the German university the state itself is to fail. Through committing itself to the mission of the German university, the state commits itself to a knowledge of that which cannot be known and which notwithstanding, as the foundation of knowledge, is that which knowledge must above all seek to know. For all its invocations of the superior power of fate, the National Socialist regime had no desire to push through to a knowledge of fate that would have put all its taxonomies into question. The historicity to which the regime appealed in its notion of a “folkish” fate was not the historicity of the transcendence of Dasein. It was only the petulant excuse with which it answered objections to its misapplication of the universalist principles of modern science. In National Socialism, historicity was the imported defence for a superficially relativistic Weltanschauung, for that in which knowledge continued to be understood as an apprehension of beings in the eternal present.

Insofar as the rectoral address speaks of defying fate to reveal itself, the regime’s notion of an already revealed historicity is not being accepted as definitive. By drawing back from a revelation of historicity out of a preference for the non-originary truth of beings apprehended in their presence, National Socialism drew back likewise from the truth of the truth by which it sought to abide. Unable to think the concealedness of Dasein the regime was unable to think the transcendence that is the essence of truth. It was thus unable to think that which Heidegger, in his 1930 lecture “On the Essence of Truth” with its exposition of Dasein as the essence of truth, calls freedom. Refusing to see this inability or, more precisely, refusing to foresee that it would prove irremediable, Heidegger in the rectoral address awaits freedom from the Nazi dictatorship. The crass absurdity of this expectation is not mollified by Heidegger’s abandonment of the conventional definition of freedom. The absurdity is intensified, since it is only through having defined freedom as the essence of truth — and no longer as the property of the autonomous subject — that Heidegger obtains for the notion of freedom a radical irreconcilability with the National Socialist understanding of humanity. The freedom that Heidegger awaits from National Socialism differs from the calculating tolerance with which liberal democracies view harmless eccentricities. Before the vision of freedom that is the polis of the recollection of Being and the accompanying destruction of the very possibility of control, Heidegger in 1933 does not hesitate in eschewing simulacra: National Socialism is the state most likely to fail, and it is to fail into the truth of the freedom of Dasein.

In the rectoral address, the desirability of this failure is assumed, rather than proved. Why the truth of what is should resist being known, and why it should confer itself on the knowledge that fails, precisely as knowledge, is set forth in “On the Essence of Truth”. In its reliance on the argument of the earlier text, “The Self-Assertion of the German University” can be seen to resolve into an exhortation to freedom.

The apparent arbitrariness of Heidegger’s adoption of the word “freedom” for an enquiry into the essence of truth is belied by the exposition of Dasein in which it occurs. The lecture “On the Essence of Truth”, properly speaking, does not adopt the meaning of the word “freedom”, but rather defines it with an originarity from which the freedom of the autonomous subject at once derives and deviates. The freedom of the latter, as the freedom of a subject determined by an abstraction from its world by fiat, presupposes an understanding of Being in which beings have been established in their distinctness. Heidegger’s enquiry into the essence of truth is an enquiry into the claim to originarity of this understanding of Being. In the conventional definition of truth as adequation, the distinctness of beings ensures the plurality in which the referentiality of both true and false judgements is deployed as well as the unequivocality in which true judgements consist. But the referentiality itself of adequation goes unexplained in an understanding of beings in which each being is held apart in the fullness of its presence.

Discussing adequation in the example of a statement and a coin, Heidegger stresses the convergence alongside the divergence:

How can what is completely dissimilar, the statement, correspond to the coin? It would have to become the coin and in this way relinquish itself entirely. The statement never succeeds in doing that. The moment it did, it would no longer be able as a statement to be in accordance with the thing. In the correspondence the statement must remain — indeed even first become — what it is. In what does its essence, so thoroughly different from every thing, consist? How is the statement able to correspond to something else, the thing, precisely by persisting in its own essence?⁴⁵

The statement, according to Heidegger, is adequate to its object only inasmuch as it remains in its distinctness and does not converge with it. Yet by remaining in its distinctness, it is unable to converge with its object and state its truth.

This convergence is not the matter of the distinctness of beings, but rather of that which Heidegger calls the Open:

As thus placed, what stands opposed must traverse an open field of opposedness [Entgegen] and nevertheless must maintain its stand as a thing and show itself as something withstanding [ein Ständiges]. This appearing of the thing in traversing a field of opposedness takes place within an open region, the openness of which is not first created by the presenting but rather is only entered into and taken over as a domain of relatedness. The relation of the presentative statement to the thing is the accomplishment of that bearing [Verhältnis] that originarily and always comes to prevail as a comportment [Verhalten].⁴⁶

The adequation of a statement to an object is a relation consummated in neither the statement nor the object. Truth has to be sought elsewhere, namely, in the comportment that brings about the relation because it alone is free to do so:

The openness of comportment as the inner condition of the possibility of correctness is grounded in freedom. *The essence of truth, as the correctness of a statement, is freedom.*⁴⁷

The essence of truth, as the condition of possibility of reference, is the ontological freedom that transgresses the distinctness of beings.

Heidegger immediately cautions against interpreting this proposition as ascribing the essence of truth to human caprice. Certainly the human being is introduced in the discussion with the notion of comportment, but the human being is to be first defined by the notion of comportment in the essence of truth:

Consideration of the essential connection between truth and freedom leads us to pursue the question of the human essence in a regard that assures us an experience of a concealed essential ground of the human being (of Dasein), and in such a manner that the experience transposes us in advance into the originarily essential domain of truth.⁴⁸

It is with a notion of freedom obtained through a meditation on truth that Heidegger comes to the question of the human in the sense, as he clarifies in a parenthesis, of Dasein. Heidegger's ontological notion of freedom is not simply imposed as a further attribute on the human, but rather brings to the fore that ontological freedom which is proper to Dasein itself in its transcendence. Emphasizing that the human being is to be understood as Dasein, Heidegger is emphasizing in this passage that which has traditionally been considered as other than an attribute, namely, existence. The human being is to be understood in its relation to originary temporality, i.e. to the finitude of its existence, rather than in terms of the attributes by which it is apprehended as a being present-at-hand. For Heidegger, only the human being exists and is Dasein, because only the human being — in his or her projects and Being-towards-death — has a definitive relation to temporality as such, and not simply to the present.

The enquiry into the essence of truth turns to the human being as a being that exists and must exist because the understanding of truth as adequation remains inexplicable on the basis of beings that are present-at-hand and whose identity is defined without recourse to the temporality that reaches beyond the discrete “now”. The actuality of adequation is accordingly a proof of existence, of mortality and of the freedom of existence. It is a proof of a being that is able to hold together two distinct beings and overcome even the greatest separation in the moments of their apprehension. The synthesis in adequation, which is the achievement of memory and projection, cannot be ascribed to a faculty of a being present-at-hand without at once relinquishing any insight into the role of ecstatic temporality in the traditional understanding of truth. Dasein is the freedom of time itself. Freedom, as it is disclosed in the essence of truth, is not the familiar freedom of the subject. It is not a property that accrues to the subject in the abstraction from its world and that, given the questionable feasibility of this abstraction, must always remain a tenuous possession. The freedom of the essence of truth is the truth of the vitiated freedom with which the subject raises only a feeble protest against its reification. This other, originary freedom does not belong to a humanity whose definition already does not essentially distinguish it from an object. Freedom, according to Heidegger, is transcendence:

The human being does not “possess” freedom as a property. At best, the converse holds: freedom, ek-sistent, disclosive Da-sein, possesses the human being — so originarily that only it secures for humanity that distinctive relatedness to beings as a whole as such which first founds all history. Only the ek-sistent human being is historical.⁴⁹

Freedom is not a property of the human being. As existence, as the existence grasped etymologically in its standing outside of itself, freedom belongs to a different understanding of Being than that according to which beings stand within themselves and deliver themselves up to a recognition of their properties. For classical ontology, the presence of beings is their unconcealment and thus their truth. But the properties of that which is unconcealed can, for Heidegger, never constitute the truth of Dasein. Dasein is freedom. It is the freedom of originary temporality as it makes sense of the now-sequence by which the conventional understanding of time issues in aporias. For Heidegger, the freedom of humanity is not its “elevation” above history into the presence that is simply the neglect of originary temporality. Instead, humanity is freedom precisely to the extent that it is historical. The historicity of humanity, and thus its freedom, is its rootedness in the world of a people. By adhering to this rootedness, and not by repudiating it, Dasein escapes the identifiability consequent on an abstraction from its world and the reduction to a being present-at-hand. A people is Dasein’s power of indetermination and the basis of its title to the essence of truth. The freedom that as the truth of adequation transgresses the distinctness of the statement and its object is the historicity of Dasein.

Only inasmuch as Dasein is historical, only inasmuch as it is always being carried beyond the presence that can never be its own but is rather the presence of the things in its world, is adequation between a statement and an object possible. Adequation takes place in the openness of Dasein, in the openness that is its Being-with. But this openness, which is the essence of truth, of unconcealment (αληθεια), is not itself open, since it always transcends the presence in which it could be apprehended in its openness. After isolating the attunement of beings in adequation from these beings themselves, Heidegger thus suggests that the essence of Dasein is concealment:

Letting beings be, which is an attuning, a bringing into accord, prevails throughout and anticipates all the open comportment that flourishes in it. Human comportment is brought into definite accord throughout by the openedness of beings as a whole. However, from the point of view of everyday calculations and preoccupations this “as a whole” appears to be incalculable and incomprehensible. It cannot be understood on the basis of the beings opened up in any given case, whether they belong to nature or to history. Although it ceaselessly brings everything into definite accord, still it remains indefinite, indeterminable; it then coincides for the most part with what is most fleeting and most unconsidered. However, what brings into accord is not nothing, but rather a concealing of beings as a whole. Precisely because letting-be always lets beings be in a particular comportment that relates to them and thus discloses them, it conceals beings as a whole. Letting-be is intrinsically at the same time a concealing. In the ek-sistent freedom of Da-sein a concealing of beings as a whole comes to pass [ereignet sich]. Here there is concealment.⁵⁰

In the freedom of Dasein there is concealment. This freedom is the essence of ἀληθεια, but it is also that which refuses to be unconcealed. As such, freedom is the originary untruth of ἀληθεια. It is the error that is inextricably both the failure and fulfilment of knowledge.⁵¹ In the concealment of Dasein, the revelation of beings as a whole occurs and thus does not occur. The revelation of beings as a whole reveals itself as concealment. Truth, understood in its essence, merges with the darkness of error. If to know the truth of a given being presupposes a knowledge of the essence of truth, beings can only be known in the presence of truth by first being known in the failure to apprehend Dasein. It is as the world intangible to everyday reckoning, and not as subjective caprice, that Dasein is the truth — and essential error — of beings. Dasein's freedom is that which never fell within the scope of classical ontology, because it constituted the Un-thought of its understanding of Being as presence. Metaphysics did not set itself the task of failing before a knowledge of time. The enduring dissatisfaction of metaphysics with the definition of truth as adaequatio rei et intellectus (already disputed, as it were in advance, by Plato in the Theaetetus) never passed beyond dissatisfaction. An inquiry into the essence of truth — in which an understanding of humanity irreducible to reification could have gained ground — was not undertaken.

In 1933 Heidegger believed the opportunity had arisen for a confrontation with the truth of Dasein. “The Self-Assertion of the German University” is testimony to that conviction. How could National Socialism — and not merely in retrospect — have encouraged such a conviction? Even if this question is unavoidable, it does not excuse reading the rectoral address simply for what it says in the jargon of the regime. Beyond what it all too clearly says in “the worst of rhetorics”⁵², “The Self-Assertion of the German University” speaks of a defiance of concealment that in all likelihood has no counterpart outside Heidegger’s own writings. The interpretation of the verse by Aeschylus is Heideggerian, rather than National Socialist. But Heidegger’s refusal to keep his philosophical utterances separate from his utterances as a proselyte of the NSDAP means that he himself was persuaded of the convergence between his thinking and the regime. Inasmuch as what is at issue is a convergence and not an identity, the relations between jargon and philosophy in the rectoral address are not without a noticeable friction. This friction was seized upon by Heidegger after the war and exaggeratedly depicted as antagonism. The trade-offs and the insane stratagems that unify the text, and rendered possible its attempt at a redefinition of National Socialism, were thereby pushed to the rear.

Under Heidegger’s leadership, the German university was to assert itself in accordance with its essence as the will to knowledge. It was to assert itself as a defiance of concealment, rather than as a defiance of Hitler. National Socialism was to be incited to participate in the failure that is reserved for the defiance of concealment. In the rectoral address, the only enemy of National Socialism is invisibility. Even after 1933 Heidegger, in his criticisms of the regime’s nihilism, does not admit any other opponent. Whatever stands in the presence of the light of knowledge stands already in the forgetfulness of the concealment of Being, and as it shares this with National Socialism, it is never able to mount an opposition on the basis of an alternative. Heidegger’s “private” National Socialism in “The Self-Assertion of the German University” is the substitution of the regime’s fundamental alternative for the regime itself: the essence of National Socialism ceases to be an apparatus of control resting on classical ontology and becomes the chance of an encounter with the concealment from which control definitively retreats.

This substitution in the rectoral address explains the laudatory tone in which Heidegger greets the new era and for which he has been both justly and unjustly reproached. The justice and the injustice of the reproach involve, not Heidegger's person, but the question of a response to the enduring reality of fascism. To wish to hear nothing in the rectoral address of the other National Socialism that is the other of National Socialism is to wish to hear nothing of the ambiguity that is arguably the element of a fundamental confrontation with fascism. "The Self-Assertion of the German University" offers concealment by way of an alternative to National Socialism and, in a sense, thereby offers nothing by way of an alternative. What the rectoral address rallies against National Socialism is the power of the false. Only with the inexplicability — the un-truth and error — of his engagement does Heidegger resist Hitler. An alternative to the regime that stood against it in the clarity of an exclusive disjunction would have mitigated its opposition through its very distinctness. The principle of the control of beings, of which National Socialism was the exemplary implementation, would not have been contested.

Heidegger's "private" National Socialism is the alternative to National Socialism that is at the same time the essence of its truth. It is the thought of the originary concealment of beings on which the regime rested and on which it could not, in its certainty as to the controllability of beings, acknowledge itself to rest. Heidegger's "private" National Socialism is not so much the theory of the fascist revolution of 1933 as the thought of the polis that is always already founded in concealment before it is brought to light and established in its identity within presence. This other polis is "other" only inasmuch as it is the polis that is never other, since, in the transcendence by which it is a Being-with, it never fully reveals itself as one polis set apart from another. It is the polis that is the community of the erring of transcendence. According to the lecture course Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein", the polis is comparable in its originarity to poetry and thought. With the comparison to poetry, Heidegger's polis is distinguished from Plato's conception. It is distinguished for the sake of that ambiguity (i.e. the concealment, not the polysemy) of the poetic word which led Plato to banish poets from the polis that is to be founded in presence. Heidegger's polis is the inconspicuous polis that precedes foundation in presence, because it is the polis of the transcendence that is the originary concealment of Dasein. In its failure, knowledge is to open itself up to this other polis. It is to open itself up to the authentic Being-with-one-another by which Heidegger understands the German Volk.

"The Self-Assertion of the German University" is a "folkish" text. Its "folkishness" does not confine itself to a few terminological concessions made to the regime, but rather reaches into the heart of Heidegger's thinking. In 1933, Heidegger attempts to lead the masses of National Socialism to the confrontation with classical ontology from which the Volk might have been born. The opportunism of Heidegger's engagement marks even the peroration of the rectoral address. Heidegger concludes:

We can only fully understand the glory and greatness of this new beginning, however, if we carry within ourselves that deep and broad thoughtfulness upon which the ancient wisdom of the Greeks drew in uttering the words:

ta ... megala panta episphele...

"All that is great stands in the storm..."

(Plato, Republic, 497d, 9)⁵³

Heidegger's translation of Plato's text is infamously inaccurate. But the storm that replaces with the jargon of National Socialism what is better rendered by "thought-provoking” is similarly the storm of a total mobilisation for the task of provoking thought to its failure before fate.

III The Feast

Heidegger's resignation of the rectorship of Freiburg University in 1934 cannot be understood as a simple withdrawal from politics. The question of the essence of the German people, which Heidegger raises repeatedly in the months of his open engagement with National Socialism, does not surrender its sudden prominence in his writings with the transfer of office. Instead, this question becomes the site of a confrontation with the regime and its understanding of the political, because it becomes entwined for Heidegger with the question of the essence of poetry. The alleged apoliticality of the latter — "this most innocent of occupations"¹ — assumes a critical force.

It is, however, in the nature of this confrontation to risk being overlooked. In Heidegger's lectures on Hölderlin, poetry is not presented in rivalry with National Socialism. It is not shown to contend with National Socialism for power. What poetry disputes, according to Heidegger, is not so much the regime's possession of power as the very definition of the political underlying disputes over the possession of power. Refusing to dispute the possession of power, poetry refuses the commensurability with National Socialism that a common object would guarantee. And through this refusal, it rebuffs the claim of the universal to arbitrate over politics. Poetry challenges National Socialism by not challenging it. It cannot contend with it for possession of the German people, because only within a deracinated politics does a people cease to be the political itself and become an object of struggle. The more originary politics of poetry, and its auspiciousness for the question of the essence of the Volk, consists in its irreducibility to the Dingbegriffe of classical ontology. Poetry is itself the political: Heidegger's texts in the thirties and early forties think through this identity in distinction from a politics of the present-at-hand.

That Heidegger's question concerning the essence of poetry, as it is formulated in numerous lectures in the years following the resignation of the rectorship, is a question against National Socialism appears to be Heidegger's own estimation in the interview conducted with Der Spiegel. There he says:

After I stepped down as rector I limited myself to teaching. In the summer semester of 1934 I lectured on "Logic." In the following semester I gave the first Hölderlin lecture. In 1936, I began the Nietzsche lectures. Anyone with ears to hear heard in these lectures a confrontation with National Socialism.²

Out of impatience with the delay in his "rehabilitation", Heidegger pronounces the confrontation in his lectures unmistakable. This declared unmistakability can, nonetheless, scarcely be brought into agreement with the conventional sense of "confrontation". What is unmistakable after the lecture course Logic as the Question concerning the Essence of Language is that Heidegger elaborates its treatment of language and the Volk into a critical destruction of aesthetics. It is in the meditations on art — without any clear precedent in the texts composed before the resignation of the rectorship — that Heidegger's disaffection with National Socialism is to be discerned. For Heidegger, with the question of art the question of the essence of the Germans is raised.

The confrontation in the lectures on Hölderlin and the confrontation in the lectures on Nietzsche, however closely related in their focus on art, are by no means reducible to the one stratagem. Although Hölderlin did not escape appropriation by the regime (in 1943, the one-hundredth anniversary of his death was the occasion of a visit by Hitler to his grave and the founding of the Hölderlin Gesellschaft under Goebbels' patronage), Heidegger never asserted that there was an ultimate consistency between Hölderlin and National Socialism. But, as Heidegger wrote on 4 November, 1945 to the new Rector of Freiburg University, with Nietzsche it was another matter:

Beginning in 1936 I embarked on a series of courses and lectures on Nietzsche, which lasted until 1945 and which represented in even clearer fashion a declaration of spiritual resistance. In truth, it is unjust to assimilate Nietzsche to National Socialism, an assimilation which — apart from what is essential — ignores his hostility to anti-Semitism and his positive attitude with respect to Russia. But on a higher plane, the debate with Nietzsche's metaphysics is a debate with nihilism as it manifests itself with increased clarity under the political form of fascism.³

Whether even on a higher plane the assimilation of Nietzsche with National Socialism is justified has become a familiar question through the commentaries of Deleuze, Derrida, Klossowski and others. For Heidegger, the higher plane on which Nietzsche reveals his affinity with National Socialism, his essential truth as a thinker, is the doctrine of the will to power. The interrogation of the preconditions in this reading, such as its reliance on the magnum opus manufactured by Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche, its deficient suspicion of the admissability of the National Socialist appropriations and its systematization of a corpus that owes more to the feuilleton than to Scholasticism, has not of itself diminished the force of Heidegger's critique of National Socialism. In certain respects, Nietzsche functions largely as an expedient cipher in this critique.

"Nietzsche" becomes the proper name of nihilism just as "Hölderlin" becomes, as is explicit in the title of the 1936 lecture in Rome, the proper name of poetry. As such,

Heidegger views them, in the lecture course Hölderlin's Hymn "Andenken", as poles in the question of the essence of the people:

‘Nietzsche and Hölderlin’ — an abyss separates the two. In abyssally different ways, both of them determine the nearest and the most distant future of the Germans and of the West.⁴

The abyss that divides Hölderlin and Nietzsche is the abyss that divides poetry and National Socialism. And it is in this abyss, rather than on a common ground, that the confrontation takes place. If Heidegger claims that his lectures on Hölderlin amount to a confrontation with the regime, it is because he exhibits Hölderlin as the poet who promises another Germany than that of National Socialism, the more originary Germany portrayed by Hölderlin as the priestess at the feast of the peoples. This other Germany is not present-at-hand. As the question concerning the essence of poetry involves, for Heidegger, a destruction of the understanding of Being as presence, it is a question that involves the ontological mission of the German Volk. Raising the question of the Un-thought of nihilism, the lectures on Hölderlin inform the critique offered in the lectures on Nietzsche. Heidegger's resignation of the rectorship is not an abdication before the political as such. In his subsequent lectures he undertakes a critique of the politics of the present-at-hand and its constitutive inability to question the will to power and, hence, to think the Un-thought of nihilism. To attempt a repetition of Heidegger's thinking on the essence of poetry is thus to seek to understand the nature, and positive inspiration, of his disavowal of National Socialism.

For Heidegger, his confrontation with nihilism in the thirties and early forties was a confrontation with National Socialism. Yet clearly, inasmuch as he was permitted to lecture until the end of the war and at the height of the terror, the confrontation can be said to have been ambiguous. National Socialism itself was expressly a confrontation with nihilism in the guise of liberal democracy. In his 1936 lecture course on Schelling, Heidegger still subscribes to this view, praising Hitler and Mussolini for introducing counter-movements to nihilism.⁵ The nihilism that Heidegger, in the reigning atmosphere of denunciation, disputed in Hölderlin's name came to encompass National Socialism because it encompassed a general conception of the political. Although the regime is criticised, it is never on account of its particularity as one political formation among many. Heidegger's confrontation with National Socialism is likewise ambiguous because Heidegger retained the Nazi topoi of German renewal and the lament over nihilism. Everything thus depends on the way these topoi are used. Yet a reconstruction of their deployment does not necessarily presuppose a desire to exonerate Heidegger. That Heidegger might be exonerated by a removal of the confrontation's secrecy is, in a sense, not even to be desired, since the notion of the political contained in such a desire — the Platonic field of the arbitration of claims to the ethical and onto-theo-logical idea of the politeia — represses the question that Heidegger raises against the will to power as an avatar of Platonism.⁶

In order to establish poetry's irreducibility to nihilism and thus the people's irreducibility to National Socialism, it must be asked in what Heidegger's conception of nihilism consists. How does it differ, if at all, from the National Socialist caricature of liberal democracies? In his 1942 lecture course Hölderlin's Hymn "The Ister", Heidegger subscribes to this caricature of the declared enemies of Germany:

We know today that the Anglo-Saxon world of Americanism has resolved to annihilate Europe, that is, the homeland [Heimat], and that means: the commencement of the Western world. Whatever has the character of commencement is indestructible. America's entry into this planetary war is not its entry into history; rather, it is already the ultimate American act of American ahistoricity and self-devastation. For this act is the renunciation of commencement, and a decision in favor of that which is without commencement. The concealed spirit of the commencement in the West will not even have the look of contempt for this trial of self-devastation without commencement, but will await its stellar hour from out of the releasement and tranquillity that belong to the commencement.⁷

It is difficult to see a confrontation with National Socialism in such a passage. Indeed, Heidegger's "spiritual resistance" never formulated itself, in either his lectures or even his posthumously published private notes, in terms of a solidarity with the enemies of the regime. Heidegger suggests that the entry of Roosevelt's America into the war does not pose a threat to the Europe of National Socialist imperialism. Nihilism, which the movement never failed to attribute to Anglo-Saxon America, is manifest in the latter's self-devastation just as the originarity of Europe ensures its invulnerability. Heidegger's thesis is that victory lies with the originary, and hence danger arises not from an opponent's military and industrial superiority but from an inability to remain within the origin. Such reasoning appears little more than propaganda. But is the origin the Germany of National Socialism? Heidegger's confrontation with the regime enacts itself as the drawing of a distinction between the two.

In the 1941-2 lecture course Hölderlin's Hymn "Andenken", Heidegger is explicit on the character of the origin and the danger it faces:

The sporadic abandonment of the German essence to Americanism already reaches the disastrous point at which Germans are ashamed that their people was once called "the people of poets and thinkers".⁸

The essence and originarity of the German people is to be the people of poets and thinkers. And that this should be their essence and originarity is not because they are, ineluctably, a people of poets and thinkers, but rather because they will be essential and originary only as such a people. In 1941-2, the Germans are surrendering their essence and hence the essential — Germany itself threatens the people of poets and thinkers. It is in fidelity to the essential that the Volk attests to its originarity and thus to its invulnerability. By breaking with the definition of the German people as the people of poets and thinkers, by mobilising the population as workers and soldiers, by emulating that which Jünger in The Worker considers Anglo-Saxon America's pre-eminent achievement, National Socialism relinquishes its only possibility of withstanding invasion. National Socialism mistakes what is to be defended and surrenders the very moment it begins preparations for war.

For Heidegger, invulnerability rests with the maintenance of the essence of a people and not with the survival of the biologically determined entities of which it is seemingly composed. Nihilism, rather than death, is the danger that lies in wait for a people and its historical, i.e. mortal, essence. As the people of poets and thinkers, Germany is made perfect in military and industrial weakness. In Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein", Heidegger accordingly favours Hölderlin's image of Germany as a maiden lost in reverie and hidden in the forest over the Niederwald monument's bloodthirsty figure with a giant sword.⁹ On the assumption that its distance from the perceived practices of Anglo-Saxon America preserves the Volk because it preserves its essence, Heidegger regards the motorisation of the armed forces with the hostility towards technology characteristic of his works of this period. In a note from the incompletely delivered lecture course Nietzsche: European Nihilism, he writes:

Within the horizon of bourgeois culture and “intellectualism” one might, for example, view the complete, i.e. fundamental “motorisation” of the military from the ground up as a manifestation simply of untrammelled “technicism” and “materialism”. It is in truth a metaphysical act that in its range certainly surpasses, for instance, the abolition of “philosophy”.¹⁰

The devastation that Heidegger fears is a withdrawal of the essence of the Volk. This devastation by which nihilism announces itself can occur as much through military success as through military defeat.

In 1943, while lecturing on Heraclitus, Heidegger refers to the devastation of the cities on the Rhine and the Ruhr and proclaims that the real disaster lies elsewhere. Everything pales before the calamity of nihilism:

Let us, however, posit the moment when the possibility of saying and understanding “is” is withdrawn from human beings. Let us attempt to think through, even if only for a few minutes, what would then become of humanity. No catastrophe that could break over the planet can be compared with this most inconspicuous of all events in which the relation to “is” is suddenly taken from humanity. But this catastrophe has already taken place; it is simply that no one has yet noticed it in its essence. Historical humanity has gone so far as to forget “is” and “Being”, renouncing all thought of that which is named in this word. Indifference towards “Being” lays siege to the planet. Humanity allows the flood of the forgetfulness of Being to wash over it. In truth, however, there is no longer even a diving within this flood, since for that to be the case the forgetfulness of Being would still need to be experienced. This forgetfulness of Being is itself already forgotten, which, of course, conforms with the essence of forgetfulness, drawing down into itself like a whirlpool everything that enters its vicinity.¹¹

Another name for this obliviousness of Being is given in An Introduction to Metaphysics:

To forget Being and cultivate only beings — that is nihilism. Nihilism thus understood is the ground of the nihilism which Nietzsche exposed in the first book of The Will to Power.¹²

Nihilism, by which the essence of the Volk is surrendered, shows itself in the inauthentic captivation with beings. In losing sight of Being for that which is and which as such inhabits the repeatability of the now, classical ontology was itself nihilistic — its legacy places itself between the Volk and its essential mission of the question of Being. Classical ontology is the ground of the nihilism that Nietzsche analyses in various contemporary manifestations without ever grasping it in itself. Heidegger thus comes to Nietzsche's assistance by furnishing both a single foundation for nihilism and the possibility of thinking its Un-thought.

A note from 1887 included in The Will to Power confesses:

Nihilism. It is ambiguous:

- A. Nihilism as a sign of increased power of the spirit: as active nihilism.
- B. Nihilism as decline and recession of the power of the spirit: as passive nihilism.¹³

Taking the term “nihilism” from Turgenev, Nietzsche extends its range but, in doing so, renders the term ambiguous — Nietzsche does not grasp that which Heidegger will name the essence of nihilism. For both Heidegger and Nietzsche, and in contrast to many National Socialist pronouncements, nihilism is everywhere. And yet it is everywhere precisely because it names the derivative structure of the repeatable: “nihilism” is the fundamental meaning of “everywhere”. In itself the ubiquity of nihilism betrays the irreducibility of Being. Being is forgotten and must, as Being, be forgotten by nihilism. The people of poets and thinkers that disappears within nihilism is the people of Being and, that is to say, of the alignment of the definitions of poetry and thought with the question of Being.

Heidegger’s analysis of the planetary catastrophe of nihilism in the passage from the lecture course Heraclitus quoted above does not, therefore, need to be understood as a retraction of Heidegger’s defiant remarks a year earlier. The indestructibility that in 1942 Heidegger attributes to the originary is not the spurious indestructibility of the untried, since the intervening military offensives of Anglo-Saxon America have no bearing upon the hidden spirit of the originary. The originary is indestructible because, as the Unthought of a ubiquitous nihilism, it cannot be found and hence cannot be destroyed. That the originary withholds itself is, in 1942, grounds for disregarding the escalation of hostilities, whereas, in 1943, it is itself the catastrophe. The one proposition does not contradict the other, and it is from within their coherence that Heidegger asserts:

The planet is in flames. The essence of humanity is out of joint. Only from the Germans, assuming that they find and defend what it is that is German, can the world-historical sobriety [Besinnung] come.¹⁴

That which is German (das Deutsche) is hidden from the Germans themselves and in its secrecy it consigns the planet to ruin. National Socialism is, properly speaking, a consequence, rather than a cause of the ruin of the age that is alternately called the forgetfulness of Being and the withholding of what it is that is German.

In the same lecture course, Heidegger explains that the sobriety that is to come from the Germans will only come from them in their as yet unattained specificity as the people of Being:

Irrespective of the substance and manner in which the external fate of the West may be articulated, the greatest and proper test of Germans still lies ahead, that test in which, at the hands of the ignorant, they are perhaps to be tested unwillingly as to whether they, the Germans, are in harmony with the Truth of Being, whether they are strong enough — over and above a readiness to die — to save the originary in its inconspicuous brilliance against the small-mindedness of the modern world.

The danger in which the “holy heart of the peoples” of the West stands is not that of a decline; it is rather the danger that, in confusion ourselves, we will capitulate to the will of modernity and be driven along with it.¹⁵

Hölderlin’s “holy heart of the peoples” faces a test in which it is to prove itself properly German through the defence of the originary. The National Socialist topos of German renewal is cited here without simply being replicated. The originarity of the German people, by which they stand in a contestation with modernity, is not, for Heidegger, the rustic gloss of a programme of industrialisation, but rather the priority of Being as it presses on them its claim as the Un-thought of modern technicism. Heidegger advocates a willingness to die in the defence of this Un-thought in a war necessarily other than the one being waged by the regime, because a Germany defined as this Un-thought and defended by the means of modern technicism is a Germany left undefended before nihilism. The campaign against nihilism by which his writings recall National Socialism is likewise what distinguishes Heidegger from the regime.

In “Overcoming Metaphysics”, a collection of notes from this period, Heidegger refuses the world war, on account of the nihilism of its parties, any fundamental oppositionality or crisis. He thus suggests that the confrontation will not take place between National Socialism and the alliance of its military opponents, but between power and that which is forgotten in power:

The struggle between those who are in power and those who want to come to power: on every side there is the struggle for power. Everywhere power itself is what is determinative. Through this struggle for power, the being of power is posited in the essence of its unconditional dominance by both sides. [...] This struggle is [...] in its essence undecidable.¹⁶

In What Is Called Thinking?, Heidegger will reiterate that the war has decided nothing.¹⁷ The decision must come from elsewhere. As the war has not issued from a conflict, there is no dispute that could be resolved in order to arrive at a peace. The difference between war and peace, according to a further note from “Overcoming Metaphysics”, is inessential to the nihilism of the manipulation of beings:

There are effects everywhere, and nowhere is there a worlding of the world and yet, although forgotten, there is still Being. Beyond war and peace, there is a mere erring of the consumption of beings in the plan’s self-guaranteeing in terms of the vacuum of the abandonment of Being. Changed into their deformation of essence, “war” and “peace” are taken up into erring, and disappear into the mere course of the escalating manufacture of what can be manufactured, because they have become unrecognizable with regard to any distinction. The question of when there will be peace cannot be answered not because the duration of war is unfathomable, but rather because the question already asks about something which no longer exists, since war is no longer anything which could terminate in peace. War has become a distortion of the consumption of beings which is continued in peace.¹⁸

As the originary, and thus as that which is inconspicuous within the manufacture and consumption of beings, Germany is not at stake in such a war, just as it falls to none of the parties in such a peace. It is this other Germany that must be defended and yet, as this other Germany, it cannot be defended, at least not in the sense of safeguarding the integrity of geographical borders. As the Un-thought of modern technicism, Heidegger’s Germany is not a being among beings, which might thus be preserved rather than exploited. Its defence involves the defence of the people within Being. In order to defend this other Germany the people must first find themselves within Being. The Germans must defend themselves through becoming the people of poets and thinkers that they never were except in literary journalism. Needless to say, it is not a matter of producing verses and treatises in place of armaments. The people of poets and thinkers is the people that defines itself otherwise than through production. It is the people that does not produce, because it does not tear beings away from nothingness and place them in the light of presence and the possibility of their manipulation. In Heidegger’s confrontation with National Socialism, poetry and thought are attributed an irreducibility to the nihilism of production.

For Heidegger, the Germans will only survive the war as well as its peace if they become the people of Hölderlin. In the 1934-5 lecture course Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein", Heidegger calls Hölderlin the "founder of German Being".¹⁹ As it is Hölderlin who grounds the people of the Un-thought of nihilism, it is in the commentaries on Hölderlin that Heidegger attempts to think the confrontation between art and National Socialism. What is brought to the fore in this confrontation is the originary Germany forgotten by Nietzsche, National Socialism and its military opponents.

Poetry, for Heidegger, does not exhaust itself within nihilism. Such a claim as yet says too little. Its resemblance to certain formulations of Nietzsche's on art's relation to nihilism should not be overestimated. A passage that Heidegger himself quotes from Nietzsche's literary remains (and, again, it is solely Heidegger's Nietzsche who is at issue) imputes a distance between art and nihilism. But significantly it is as the power of enervation, and not as the obliviousness of Being, that Nietzsche here understands nihilism:

Very early in my life I took the question of the relation of art to truth seriously: even now I stand in holy dread in the face of this discordance. My first book was devoted to it. The Birth of Tragedy believes in art on the background of another belief — that it is not possible to live with truth, that the "will to truth" is already a symptom of degeneration.²⁰

The decadence of the “will to truth” is its opposition to “life”. Heidegger quotes this passage in a reading of Nietzsche’s exposition of Platonism as nihilism. Summarising this exposition, Heidegger writes:

The major debility of the basic force of Dasein consists in the calumny and denigration of the fundamental orienting force of “life” itself. Such defamation of creative life, however, has its grounds in the fact that things are posited above life which make negation of it desirable. The desirable, the ideal, is the supersensuous, interpreted as genuine being [das eigentlich Seiende]. This interpretation of being is accomplished in the Platonic philosophy. The theory of Ideas founds the ideal, and that means the definitive preeminence of the supersensuous, in determining and dominating the sensuous.²¹

To overcome nihilism is here, for Nietzsche, to overturn Platonism. Heidegger continues:

Overturning Platonism means, first, shattering the preeminence of the supersensuous as the ideal. Beings, being what they are, may not be despised on the basis of what should and ought to be. But at the same time, in opposition to the philosophy of the ideal and to the installation of what ought to be and of the “should,” the inversion sanctions the investigation and determination of that which is — it summons the question “What is being itself?” If the “should” is the supersensuous, then being itself, that which is, conceived as liberated from the “should,” can only be the sensuous. But with that the essence of the sensuous is not given; its definition is given up. In contrast, the realm of true being, of the true, and thereby the essence of truth, is demarcated; as before, however, already in Platonism, the true is to be attained on the path of knowledge.²²

With respect to the question of Being, Nietzsche's inverted Platonism is as reductionist as the metaphysics it overturns, since both ground themselves in the conviction that the truth of beings is a matter to be expounded in theories of knowledge. As a result, truth remains, with Nietzsche, that which must be isolated from its doubles. Nietzsche's affirmation of the sensuous, of what he terms "life" and "art", constitutes simply a further variant of the nihilism of the obliviousness of Being. It is an affirmation that is fundamentally a negation, and not simply because the sensuous that is affirmed defines itself as the negative of the supersensuous. The negation is the continued exclusion of Being as such through forgetfulness. Nietzsche retains the antithesis of the sensuous and the supersensuous and thereby retains the ontology of the Platonic doctrine of ideas. The confrontation with the reductionism of nihilism cannot, for Heidegger, take place through the sensuousness of the work of art. It is not by a single aspect that the work of art presents this confrontation; it is not even by its entirety, since this entirety — as the distinct assemblage of qualities — falls within the understanding of truth as adequation. The work of art, which for Heidegger is essentially poetry, enacts a confrontation with nihilism because it restores truth as adequation to its other origin in the concealment and unconcealment of the question of Being.

Yet why should this be the privilege of the work of art? To what extent does Heidegger thereby replicate the nihilistic one-sidedness of Platonism and its Nietzschean inversion? These objections are addressed in Heidegger's most explicit response to the task of defining the work of art. In "The Origin of the Work of Art", composed in the period of the lectures on Nietzsche and Hölderlin, Heidegger writes: "The work as work sets up a world. The work holds open the open region of the world.”²³ The privilege of the work of art thus disappears into the world it establishes. That, for Heidegger, the work of art is never simply “itself” can be read in his commentary, in “The Origin of the Work of Art”, on an inexactly specified painting by van Gogh:

Van Gogh’s painting is the disclosure of what the equipment, the pair of peasant shoes, is in truth. This being emerges into the unconcealment of its Being. The Greeks called the unconcealment of beings aletheia.²⁴

Van Gogh’s painting discloses what the pair of peasant shoes truly is. This is not to disclose the peasant shoes in conformity with the understanding of truth dominant in the natural sciences. What emerges into unconcealment in the painting is not the comprehensive set of the properties of a being present-at-hand, but rather the Being of the peasant shoes. What is thus unconcealed in van Gogh’s painting is the very questionability of unconcealment. Van Gogh’s painting reveals the limits of revelation. Through depicting an object, it remains within the within the conventional understanding of representation and yet it likewise depicts the unrepresentable. In being depicted, the peasant shoes step beyond their ontic self-evidence into the truth of their Being and the Being (Da-sein) of their truth. The painting, Heidegger continues, restores to the shoes their world:

But above all, the work did not, as it might seem at first, serve merely for a better visualizing of what a piece of equipment is. Rather, the equipmentality of equipment first expressly comes to the fore through the work and only in the work.²⁵

The true object of depiction in the work of art is the object's otherwise overlooked equipmentality. In van Gogh's painting, equipmentality is the peasant's world of the open fields in which the use of the shoes is sustained. That the disclosure of equipmentality is not being identified in "The Origin of the Work of Art" with an insight into the optimal use of a piece of equipment is clear from Heidegger's own expansive description:

From the dark opening of the worn insides of the shoes the toilsome tread of the worker stares forth. In the stiffly rugged heaviness of the shoes there is the accumulated tenacity of her slow trudge through the far-spreading and ever-uniform furrows of the field swept by a raw wind. On the leather lie the dampness and richness of the soil. Under the soles slides the loneliness of the field-path as evening falls. In the shoes vibrates the silent call of the earth, its quiet gift of the ripening grain and its unexplained self-refusal in the fallow desolation of the wintry field. This equipment is pervaded by uncomplaining worry as to the certainty of bread, the wordless joy of having once more withstood want, the trembling before the impending childbed and shivering at the surrounding menace of death.²⁶

Van Gogh's painting discloses the peasant woman's Being-in-the-world. That which defines the peasant shoes as equipment, i.e. that which is their equipmentality, is the phenomenon of world in all its fullness. In van Gogh's painting of a pair of peasant shoes, a world "appears".

But why should a pair of peasant's shoes become so voluble through being depicted in the work of art? In what way is the equipmentality that, according to "The Origin of the Work of Art", comes to light only in the work of art different from the equipments disclosed, according to Being and Time, in the broken, inappropriate or missing tool? Perhaps the exclusiveness of the emergence of equipments claimed for the work of art in the later text is not to be interpreted as a revision of the treatment in the earlier text. Perhaps the work of art is nothing other than a broken, inappropriate or missing tool and can be nothing other if it is to be the means of a confrontation with technicism. The Volk of the Un-thought of nihilism and the immersion in the manipulation of beings would therefore more clearly be the people of the poets.

In Being and Time, art does not feature as a matter for exposition. In what way is the argument of “The Origin of the Work of Art” prefigured, if at all, in Heidegger’s earlier examination of the disclosure of the equipments (Zeugsein) of the equipment (Zeug)? In §15 of Being and Time, Heidegger writes of the character of readiness-to-hand that is proper to the tool:

The peculiarity of what is proximally ready-to-hand is that, in its readiness-to-hand, it must, as it were, withdraw [zurückzuziehen] in order to be ready-to-hand quite authentically.²⁷

That which is ready-to-hand, and can thus be used as a tool (Zeug), is only ready-to-hand by means of the withdrawal whereby, as Heidegger explains, the context of its readiness-to-hand effaces itself. Without this context a tool ceases to be a tool and yet this context must also withdraw if the tool is to be a tool:

Taken strictly, there ‘is’ no such thing as an equipment. To the Being of any equipment there always belongs a totality of equipment, in which it can be this equipment that it is. Equipment is essentially ‘something in-order-to...’ [“etwas um-zu...”].²⁸

In presenting itself immediately for use, a tool cannot present the mediation of the equipmental totality whereby it is what it is as something ready-to-hand. The totality of equipment is not the sum of interrelated tools, but rather the context, in the fullest sense, of the use of a given piece of equipment. Absorbed in the use of a tool, Dasein overlooks its context and ignores the open-endedness of its in-order-to.... So long as it is employed, the tool keeps the world in which it is employed secret. Alongside its individual function as a given piece of equipment, equipment as equipment that is employed has the function of warding off threats to Dasein's immersion in the realm of that which Heidegger in Being and Time describes as the everyday:

To the everydayness of Being-in-the-world there belong certain modes of concern. These permit the entities with which we concern ourselves to be encountered in such a way that the worldly character of what is within-the-world comes to the fore. When we concern ourselves with something, the entities which are most closely ready-to-hand may be met as something unusable, not properly adapted for the use we have decided upon. The tool turns out to be damaged, or the material unsuitable. In each of these cases equipment is here, ready-to-hand. We discover its unusability, however, not by looking at it and establishing its properties, but rather by the circumspection of the dealings in which we use it. When its unusability is thus discovered, equipment becomes conspicuous. This conspicuousness presents the ready-to-hand equipment as in a certain un-readiness-to-hand.²⁹

Here the inappropriate or damaged tool, just as the unwearable peasant shoes of van Gogh's painting in "The Origin of the Work of Art", discloses its world.

But is world in Being and Time to be understood differently from world in "The Origin of the Work of Art"? Certainly the style in which they are described is different, but the prose of the earlier text does not imply that it is a prosaic world that is at issue. If Heidegger in 1927 had meant by "world" only the systematic interrelations of a production process, then Being and Time would be a work of pragmatism, rather than of fundamental ontology. Reflecting on the misinterpretations of his work, Heidegger writes in 1941:

For Heidegger, the world consists only of cooking pots, pitchforks and lampshades. He has no relationship to "higher culture", not to speak of "Nature", because none of that is to be found in Being and Time.

The actual basis for this misinterpretation does not lie however in the sheer superficiality of the "reading", but rather in the fact that one takes it for granted that the author can be ascribed a desire to put forward a "system of the world", while something nonetheless quite different is being asked.³⁰

The conspicuousness of equipment in the text of 1927 is not the clarity with which it presents itself to the skilled eye of a time-and-motion expert. This conspicuousness has to be understood more radically, as a rupture in the very understanding of Being.

The claim in "The Origin of the Work of Art" that it is only in the work that the equipmentality of equipment first comes to the fore does not contest the radicality of the rupture in Being and Time. The work of art does not exclude broken, inappropriate or missing equipment and nor is it simply interchangeable with such equipment. Instead, it is its truth. The work of art sets up the world that broken, inappropriate or missing equipment merely discloses. The disclosures of broken, inappropriate or missing equipment are thus dependent on the work of art. Such a claim is, of course, no less peculiar than the claim that the work of art is nothing other than a broken, inappropriate or missing tool. But with the assertion of the priority of the work of art, Heidegger endeavours to overcome the incidentality and fortuitousness of the disclosures of broken, inappropriate or missing equipment. The work of art becomes the truth of these disclosures inasmuch as it is essentially that which the tool is only accidentally, namely, the occasion for the question of Being. The work of art is, as it were, the tool that is at once broken, inappropriate and missing in its very essence.

In van Gogh's painting, the equipment of the peasant woman's shoes is missing and it is a loss that can never be made good and can never be overlooked. Readiness-to-hand does not withdraw behind the ready-to-hand. The missing tool — and it is its absence that the work of art presents through the non-presentation of depiction — never reveals merely itself. In Being and Time, Heidegger writes:

Similarly, when something ready-to-hand is found missing, though its everyday presence [Zugegensein] has been so obvious that we have never taken any notice of it, this makes a break in those referential contexts which circumspection discovers. Our circumspection comes up against emptiness, and now sees for the first time what the missing article was ready-to-hand with, and what it was ready-to-hand for. The environment announces itself afresh.³¹

The absence of the object of depiction is never a simple defect of the work of art, because it exposes the object's transcendence (its in-order-to...). Van Gogh's painting does not show a pair of peasant's shoes, so much as the environment (Umwelt) in which they are worn. The shoes present themselves to circumspection (Umsicht), insofar as the painting does not present a tool for use. The work of art frustrates the call for a tool in offering only its image and yet by this frustration it gives more than the tool itself: it gives the world from which technicism sustains itself in forgetfulness.

In conformity with his critical destruction in the 1930s of the nihilism of the traditional understanding of truth, Heidegger is emphatic in "The Origin of the Work of Art" that the truth of the work of art is not to be measured by the accuracy of the image of its object. More is at stake:

Agreement with what is has long been taken to be the essence of truth.

But then, is it our opinion that this painting by van Gogh depicts a pair of peasant shoes somewhere at hand, and is a work of art because it does so successfully? Is it our opinion that the painting draws a likeness from something actual and transposes it into a product of artistic — production? By no means.³²

In painting the peasant shoes, van Gogh paints more than their mere image — and the measure of the work of art is thus not the measure of its representational accuracy. The above extract does not banish the notion of representation from discussions of art.³³

Heidegger's rejection of the view that the truth of art lies in its adequation to an extant object does not amount to an appeal against the sentence that Plato lays upon mimesis in The Republic. In order to follow Heidegger's confrontation with Platonism and its Nietzschean offshoot, the common underestimation and superficial rebuttals of Plato's thinking of mimesis must first be dismissed.³⁴

In Book X of The Republic, Plato contends that mimesis is not the preserve of the artist but characterises also the product of the manual worker in its distance from the idea and thus from truth:

And what of the maker of the bed? Were you not saying that he too makes, not the idea which according to our view is the real object denoted by the word bed, but only a particular bed?

Yes, I did.

Then if he does not make a real object he cannot make what is, but only some semblance of existence; and if any one were to say that the work of the maker of the bed, or of any other workman, has real existence, he could hardly be supposed to be speaking the truth.

Not, at least, he replied, in the view of those who make a business of these discussions.

No wonder, then, that his work too is an indistinct expression of truth.³⁵

As truth does not lie with the extant object, the truth of the work of art is for Plato likewise not defined by its adequation to an extant object. Heidegger writes therefore in Nietzsche:

The distance from Being and its pure visibility is definitive for the definition of the essence of the mimetes. What is decisive for the Greek-Platonic concept of mimesis or imitation is not reproduction or portraiture, not the fact that the painter provides us with the same thing once again; what is decisive is that this is precisely what he cannot do, that he is even less capable than the craftsman of duplicating the same thing. It is therefore wrongheaded to apply to mimesis notions of “naturalistic” or “primitivistic” copying and reproducing. Imitation is subordinate production.³⁶

It is not its distance from the extant object, but its distance from Being determined as presence in the idea that is decisive for Plato’s thinking on the work of art. With differing inspirations, both Plato and Heidegger consider art as a relic of a non-metaphysical understanding of Being.³⁷ Heidegger, for whom the possibility of a confrontation with the nihilism of Platonism rests with this distance from metaphysics, thus proposes mimesis as the definition of art. In what is other than an impartial citation of Plato, he asserts: “But mimesis is the essence of all art.”³⁸

It is worth noting that this sentence does not express a blindness to non-representative art, since the disavowal of an adequation with an extant object that such art practises does not affect its subordination to its ἰδέα . The ἰδέα of a non-representative work of art, as of any work of art, is its appearance, its εἶδος . It is thus not because mimesis is the essence of all art that Heidegger later queries, in The Principle of Reason with its analysis of an age of the total manipulation of material, whether abstract art is indeed art:

That in such an age art becomes objectless testifies to its historical appropriateness, and this above all when nonrepresentational [gegenstandlose] art conceives of its own productions as no longer being able to be works, rather as being something for which the suitable word is lacking.³⁹

Such nonrepresentational art still appears and is thus, for Platonism, still subordinate to its ἰδεα . Yet it endeavours to suppress the question that mimesis offers to the understanding of Being as presence.⁴⁰ Such art seeks to erase its distance from its ἰδεα .

In “Plato’s Doctrine of Truth”, a reading of Plato almost as frequently contested as his reading of Nietzsche,⁴¹ Heidegger clarifies the meaning of appearance in Platonism:

Plato does not regard this “visible form” as a mere “aspect.” For him the “visible form” has in addition something of a “stepping forth” whereby a thing “presents” itself. Standing in its “visible form” the being itself shows itself.⁴²

That which is presents itself in its appearance as it is, and it is the ἰδεα that presents itself:

The “idea” does not first let something else (behind it) “shine in its appearance” [“erscheinen”]; it itself is what shines, it is concerned only with the shining of itself. The ἰδεα is that which can shine [das Scheinsame]. The essence of the idea consists in its ability to shine and be seen [Schein- und Sichtsamkeit]. This is what brings about presencing, specifically the coming to presence of what a being is in any given instance.⁴³

Every work of art appears as its presence but also fails to appear as its presence. It falls short of its own ἰδεα and, therefore, cannot be said to be true even to itself. And that it fails to appear as its presence is because it does not emerge into the constancy of knowledge.

Already in the 1924-5 lecture course Plato's Sophist, Heidegger expatiates on the relation between presence and knowledge:

And the pure letting the world be encountered is a making present. As such, it is only temporally that it can express itself in the appropriate speaking about the world: the Being of the world is presence.⁴⁴

Knowledge in Platonism is explicitly defined as encounter. Mimesis is the frustration of the encounter. The work of art, for Plato, is obscure because it does not fully give itself up to be known. It cannot do so because its perishability is its essential possibility of absence. The work of art deceives, but the substitution of a depiction for an extant object is incidental to the deception of mimesis. The work of art offers itself but never ceases to offer itself because its offer is never accepted, its subordination to the ιδέα is never revoked in consummation. The act of offering, as its distance from presence, deprives it of Being and, that is to say, of appearance. In one respect, the essence of the work of art is, for Plato, the threat of invisibility. The work of art, contrary to Nietzsche's complementary readings of art and Platonism, refuses itself to the senses — it withdraws from the gaze of knowledge.

The truth of metaphysics has to be won in the face of this secretiveness, as Heidegger writes:

Everything depends on the ορθότης, the correctness of the gaze. Through this correctness, seeing or knowing becomes something correct so that in the end it looks directly at the highest idea and fixes itself in this “direct alignment.” In so directing itself, apprehending conforms itself to what is to be seen: the “visible form” of the being.⁴⁵

The gaze has always, as it were, to look beyond the work of art in order to behold the truth that the work of art itself is, because appearance grants its immediacy solely to presence. That which is not present deludes. Being, as that which is, retracts in Platonism into the opposite of the false. Rediscovering the alternative to presence in the work of art, Platonism defines the work of art by the indigence that can but compel the work of art to seek adequation with that which is present. The representation of an extant object becomes the sum of the truth of the work of art.

This contraction of Being into presence is, for Heidegger, the ground of nihilism that Nietzsche himself failed to recognise and thus failed to challenge in his overturning of Platonism. Nietzsche adheres fundamentally to the notion of truth that arises with the contraction of Being:

Nietzsche’s determination of truth as the incorrectness of thinking is in agreement with the traditional essence of truth as the correctness of assertion (λογος). Nietzsche’s concept of truth displays the last glimmer of the most extreme consequence of the change of truth from the unhiddenness of beings to the correctness of the gaze. The change itself is brought about in the determination of the Being of beings (in Greek: the being present of what is present) as ἰδεα.⁴⁶

By following Plato in defining truth within an antithesis with the false, Nietzsche does not see beyond the contraction of Being. For Heidegger, Nietzsche is “the most unrestrained Platonist in the history of Western metaphysics”⁴⁷ because his opposition to Plato never develops into a confrontation on the basis of an alternative. Nietzsche's maintenance of truth in an antithesis prevents him from raising a question against the determination of Being as presence and against the nihilistic conception of art dependent on this determination. Nietzsche, according to Heidegger, abolishes the distance that falsehood opens between the work of art and the Platonic determination of Being. In so doing, he ostensibly affirms art when it is precisely art's failure within Platonism that carries the possibility of thinking through nihilism. Nietzsche's conception of art as the true remains nihilistic, in Heidegger's sense, because it is, so to speak, too affirmative. The will to power hinders Nietzsche from grasping failure as such. Everything becomes a manifestation of will to power. Even the false is absorbed into the presence of its appearance. Heidegger's response to Plato, by contrast, does not involve disputing the definition of art as the failure of presence.⁴⁸ Heidegger, however, wishes to grasp this failure as failure, since it is an understanding of this failure that puts into question the entire metaphysics of presence from Plato to Nietzsche.

To this end, Heidegger repeats the judgements of metaphysics on the failure of art.⁴⁹ The afterword to "The Origin of the Work of Art" acquiesces to Hegel's judgement on the supercession of art in order not to lose sight of art's distance from metaphysics. The passage is worth quoting at length, not merely on account of its implicit critique of Nietzsche's affirmation of art:

In the most comprehensive reflection on the essence of art that the West possesses — comprehensive because it stems from metaphysics — namely, Hegel's Lectures on Aesthetics, the following propositions occur:

Art no longer counts for us as the highest manner in which truth obtains existence for itself.

One may well hope that art will continue to advance and perfect itself, but its form has ceased to be the highest need of spirit.

In all these relationships art is and remains for us, on the side of its highest vocation, something past.

The judgment that Hegel passes in these statements cannot be evaded by pointing out that since Hegel's lectures on aesthetics were given for the last time during the winter of 1828-29 at the University of Berlin we have seen the rise of many new artworks and new art movements. Hegel never meant to deny this possibility. But the question remains: Is art still an essential and necessary way in which that truth happens which is decisive for our historical existence, or is art no longer of this character? If, however, it is such no longer, then there remains the question as to why this is so. The truth of Hegel's judgment has not yet been decided; for behind this verdict there stands Western thought since the Greeks. Such thought corresponds to a truth of beings that has already happened. Decision upon the judgement will be made, if at all, from and about this truth of beings. Until then the judgement remains in force. But for that very reason the question is necessary as to whether the truth that the judgement declares is final and conclusive, and what follows if it is.⁵⁰

Hegel's judgement remains binding in spite of Nietzsche. Hegel's judgement that art has ceased to be the highest form in which truth attains existence does not incite Heidegger to restore art to its alleged earlier dignity, since the sentence expresses a thoroughly metaphysical reading of art's irreducibility to metaphysics. As it is only with metaphysics, and its contraction of Being to presence, that truth begins to attain existence in higher and lower forms, neither art nor anything else is able to yield pre-eminence to metaphysics. Art is thus not so much superseded by metaphysics, as obscured in its other understanding of truth. The constitutive absence of a highest form, rather than its historical loss, defines this other understanding, which within metaphysics can only be recalled as failure. This “failure” has to be grasped as what it is in itself — and not merely as an incidental negation of the highest form — if the truth of Being is not to be overlooked in the preoccupation with presence. The “failure” of art is Being’s failure to be merely present. To grasp the “failure” of presence as the essence of art is to grasp art as indeterminate. It is to grasp art as the questionability of the apprehension of beings in the light of presence. Through distinguishing itself from the originary understanding of Being, the highest form of truth establishes that from which it distinguishes itself as the distinct entity known as “art”. Metaphysics hence reifies even that from which it distanced itself for the sake of the reification of beings in the light of presence. It is the distinctness of the entity known in metaphysics as “art” that risks interposing itself and reformulating Heidegger’s question here concerning the essence of truth as the property of a superseded form in which truth attains existence. Once art becomes a being among beings, the question of Being loses its urgency because the originary understanding of truth has become regional. Heidegger’s thinking on art seeks to answer to the essence of truth by grasping failure in its originarity as a contestation of the determination of Being as presence. For Heidegger, what is at stake in the Auseinandersetzung is a disclosure of the modesty of Being in contrast to the triumphalism of the will to power.

Art’s distance from nihilism is its failure before presence. It falters in the reproduction of its idea and through its faltering it shows more than its idea: it shows the world that the idea otherwise conceals. With the example of the van Gogh painting in “The Origin of the Work of Art”, Heidegger is not proposing that the work of art is necessarily the depiction of a tool, but rather that any object of depiction, as ἰδέα , is restored in the work of art to the world suppressed in its presence. Heidegger's example recalls the exposition of equipmentality in Being and Time, but in the later text there has been a shift from the accidental to the essential. The work of art sets up the world that the broken, inappropriate or missing tool discloses in deviations from their use. That the work of art sets up a world is not because it is a distinct entity, falling within the purview of metaphysics, but rather because it is the understanding of the Being of the phenomenon of world. Quarantined in the metaphysical entity known as "art", this other understanding still announces itself in its transcendence. Art's failure before presence recovers beings for Being and in this uncontained failure it is the originary failure of Being.⁵¹ The failure is ecstatic and transcends presence. Failing before presence art is never itself, never a distinct identity and thus the privilege of truth with which Heidegger endows the work of art is never an exclusive privilege in a further variation of Platonism. In short, it is not as any given extant and identifiable work of art, but rather as the failure of presence that the work of art restores adequation to the Open of the essence of truth.

That which in its distance from the idea is understood within Platonism as failure cannot, however, in its ecstasy be derived from presence. For Platonism, the distance from the idea becomes a frustrated movement towards the idea. The mimetes is unable to create, because mimesis is, by definition, the inability to overcome the distance from presence. The works of the mimetes remain shadowy and insubstantial (μη ον). They do not enunciate a clean break with nothingness and hence waver in undecidability between presence and nothingness. It is the inability of the mimetes, this failure that Heidegger retains and formulates as the originarity of art. The work of art does not create because world as world cannot be severed from nothingness in order to be created. World fails; it is the suppression of this failure that constitutes the essence of creation as the ascendancy of presence over nothingness.

In The Symposium, Diotima's definition of poetry and all the crafts mistakes the derivative for the originary and offers a speciously anti-Platonic appraisal:

By its original meaning poetry means simply creation, and creation, as you know, can take very various forms. Any action which is the cause of a thing emerging from non-existence might be called poetry, and all the processes in all the crafts are kinds of poetry, and all those who are engaged in them poets.⁵²

The opportunity to interrogate presence is forgone. Here "poetry" is exhibited as the essence of handicraft because, more than the names of the other arts, it signifies creation. In "The Origin of the Work of Art", Heidegger retains this precedence of poetry, but for other reasons: "All art, as the letting happen of the advent of the truth of beings, is as such, in essence, poetry."⁵³ It is its relation to the truth of beings, and not its creativity, that establishes poetry, in Heidegger's view, as the essence of art. As the historical name of that from which metaphysics had to disentangle itself in order to come to itself in presence, "poetry" is, for Heidegger, the name of a non-metaphysical understanding of truth. It is in this sense that Heidegger is able to speak of poetry as the essence of art in a text whose chief examples are a van Gogh painting and a Greek temple. And that "poetry" is not to be interpreted in the sense of creation is the admonition in a note from Metaphysics and Nihilism from 1940-1: "Poetry — no longer as art; with the end of metaphysics the end of 'art' — τεχνη".⁵⁴ As poetry (Dichtung) is neither ποιησις nor τεχνη, as it neither creates nor produces, its status as the essence of the arts must have another, more originary foundation.

And, for Heidegger, it is because “poetry” is “language” that it constitutes the internal condition of possibility of the other arts. In “The Origin of the Work of Art” he asserts of language:

It not only puts forth in words and statements what is overtly or covertly intended to be communicated; language alone brings beings as beings into the open for the first time.⁵⁵

“Poetry” is the essence of the arts and “language” is that which alone brings beings as beings into the open. The work of art, inasmuch as it is language, reveals beings as such and thus reveals them in their Being. Revealing them not merely in the presence of their apprehensibility, it reveals them in their truth. The essence of all art is poetry because poetry, in its turn, is defined, for Heidegger, by language’s foundation of world. In comparison with its foundation of world, all other characteristics of language are inessential. Insofar as it founds a world, the work of art is language.

Language founds because it fails to create. If the work of art functions — and thus does not function — as a broken, inappropriate or missing tool, is language itself a tool of this kind? Heidegger in “Hölderlin and the Essence of Poetry” denies, however, that language is a tool at all:

Language is not merely a tool which man possesses alongside many others; rather, language first grants the possibility of standing in the midst of the openness of beings.⁵⁶

As the precondition of every tool, language cannot be a tool among others that the human being possesses. It is, nevertheless, of the concealed essence of language that Heidegger writes, as a remark from the “Letter on ‘Humanism’” emphasises:

Language still denies us its essence: that it is the house of the truth of Being. Instead, language surrenders itself to our mere willing and trafficking as an instrument of domination over beings.⁵⁷

Language itself becomes a tool to be restored to its world through the work of art. In “Hölderlin and the Essence of Poetry”, it is the work of art that is the precondition of language:

Poetry is a founding: a naming of being and of the essence of all things — not just any saying, but that whereby everything first steps into the open, which we then discuss and talk about in everyday language. Hence poetry never takes language as a material at its disposal; rather, poetry itself first makes language possible. Poetry is the primal language of a historical people.⁵⁸

What is essential to the work of art, to language, and to poetry is the foundation of world. But that the foundation of world is essential does not mean that it is an invariant of the positivistic entities known as the work of art, language and poetry. The foundation of world is the highest task and that by means of which the work of art, language and poetry are essential. Poetry as poetry, which is to say, in its essence as the foundation of world, precedes language understood as a material at its disposal. Poetry is language’s condition of possibility and as such it sustains, regardless of whether it is acknowledged or not, not only every discourse, but also every activity. Poetry itself is the clearing of beings.

Heidegger's turn to poetry after the resignation of the rectorship was not a turn away from any given being. As the turn to poetry was an engagement with the essential, it cannot be equated with a renunciation of the political. Poetry is itself the truth of the πολις. The decision that delimits the domain of the political as one domain among others presupposes the grounding of beings in poetry. Every essence becomes poetic with the establishment of the originarity of its understanding of Being. In addressing the question of the essence of poetry, Heidegger addresses the question of the essence of the political. But why should poetry be a privileged point of access to the essence of the political? It is because, in the context of National Socialism, the essence of the political had withdrawn from politics. In his confrontation with Nietzsche and the Hitlerian dictatorship, Heidegger has recourse to a notion of poetry as the Un-thought of the will to power. Poetry becomes that which hesitates and it thereby founds world in the openness that nihilism suppresses in its drive to the absolute presence of beings. Judged by the criteria of nihilism, poetry is a failure. Only when language fails, i.e. only when it is more than the unambiguous transmission of items of information, does it disclose its essence and show itself to be poetry. That language is essentially not a tool in the mobilisation of the masses is the suspicion initiated through its being "broken" as a tool in poetry. The disclosure of the essence depends on an abuse of mere serviceability, since use in general, for early and middle Heidegger, is opposed to a revelation of essence. The essential is the unmanageable. A tool displays its essence — the world within which it is employed and "explained" — when it is broken, missing or inappropriate, and thus its use always presupposes a neglect of the task of understanding its essence. It is, in a sense, always a broken, missing or inappropriate tool that is unwittingly being used. To the extent that the work of art has been traditionally defined by being at odds with unmanageability, by the fashioning of its material, by its creating and bringing forth, it is less a work of art, for Heidegger, than a figure of the secondary realm of τεχνη: only the inessential knows perfection. Where National Socialism evaded the foundational failure composing, in the shape of poetry, the essence of the political and the ground of a historical people, it promulgated the nihilism of the obliviousness of Being under the cover of its achievements. τεχνη can never be the essence of a people; the essence of a people is always to be a people of the “failure” of world to reduce itself to presence.

It is on account of the priority of failure over τεχνη that the ultimate foundation of a people is poetry. In Hölderlin's Hymns “Germanien” and “Der Rhein”, Heidegger writes:

Poetization is foundation, it is a realising [erwirkend] grounding of the enduring. The poet is the one who grounds Being. That which, in the everyday, we name the real [das Wirkliche], is, at bottom, unreal. Because the sign of the gods is, as it were, built by a poet into the foundation walls of a people's language (perhaps without the people's suspecting this at first), Being is founded in the historical Dasein of the people, and in this Being a directive and a dependence are laid and left behind.⁵⁹

Poetry composes the historical ground of a people, inasmuch as it is not reducible to the a-historicity of presence. Its distance from presence — and it is distant from presence only inasmuch as it always overreaches presence — is its distance from the unreal. That which we are accustomed to call real is ultimately unreal, because its transparency and familiarity is the consequence of its abstraction from world. Τεχνη, realising itself in the obliviousness of world, does nothing but produce its own realisation and yet all the proofs it creates of its reality are, for that very reason, insufficient. It merely proves its remoteness from Being and thereby, for Heidegger, its “unreality”.

In the 1941 lecture course Basic Concepts, Heidegger traces back to Nietzsche the retreat of the originary poetic foundation of the people in favour of the mobilisation of the worker and the soldier and the hegemony of τεχνη:

In the interim, it has been decided that “the worker” and “the soldier” completely determine the face of the actual, all political systems in the narrow sense notwithstanding. These names are not meant here as names for a social class or profession. They indicate, in a unique fusion, the type of humanity taken as measure by the present world-convulsion for its fulfillment, giving direction and foundation to one’s relation to beings. The names “worker” and “soldier” are thus metaphysical titles and name that form of the human fulfillment of the Being of beings now become manifest, which Nietzsche presciently grasped as the “will to power”.⁶⁰

The “worker” and the “soldier” are distinguished by their engagement in reality, but Heidegger queries whether such experience can satisfy its claims to essentiality:

But do “workers” and “soldiers”, in virtue of this experience, also know the Being of beings? No. Yet perhaps they no longer need to know it. Perhaps the Being of beings has never been experienced by those who directly shape, produce, and represent beings. Perhaps Being was always brought to knowledge merely “by the way,” like something apparently “superfluous.”⁶¹

Inasmuch as they are absorbed solely in that which is, the “worker” and the “soldier” disavow Being and hence the ground, i.e. the “reality” of their engagement. Being lies elsewhere. A people, if it is to ground itself, must ground itself within Being and, for Heidegger, it is within the failure of production that is poetry that Being offers itself as ground.

Here Heidegger’s critique of metaphysics is the elaboration of a topos of German conservatism.⁶² That the essence of the people rests with the Un-thought of τεχνη is a contention not at all alien to the strain of German nationalism that sought to make a virtue of the country’s economic backwardness, and even of its defeat in war.⁶³ Expounding the contingency of momentary underdevelopment as spiritual resistance to industrialisation, this nationalism prided itself on the absence of any achievements outside the very constricted sphere defined as culture. Modernisation, insofar as it challenged the preponderance of this sphere and involved levelling differences between Germany and its Western neighbours, was demonised as an assault on the national character. Economic development was cultural regression and an aping of the foreign. Even though Heidegger is perhaps the most eloquent and profound advocate of this version of German nationalism, its tone and principles are to be heard in Thomas Mann’s Reflections of a nonpolitical man, Hofmannsthal’s address “Literature as the Spiritual Space of the Nation” and — notwithstanding its corrective cynicism — Adorno’s brief text “On the Question: What is German?”. What is peculiar to Heidegger’s critique of industrialisation is that he does not hypostasise the nation’s backwardness as its essence, but rather defines its essence in relation to a future other than modernisation.⁶⁴ That Germany has not yet realised itself is an assessment that Heidegger shares with the exponents of industrialisation. But, for Heidegger, Germany is to realise itself in the future as such, i.e. in the future as ecstasis rather than as a present whose time is yet to come. Germany awaits itself and it must await itself if it is to maintain a distance from presence and the nihilism of τεχνη.

In the “Evening Conversation between a Younger and an Older Prisoner of War in a Camp in Russia” from 1945, Heidegger accordingly draws together the notions of the people, poetry and waiting:

THE ELDER: My supposition is that the poetic character of your thinking lies rather in its nature as a waiting and that basically your thinking already was a waiting even before it was raised for you today into clear knowledge.

THE YOUNGER: Perhaps the poets and thinkers of a people are nothing other than those who are waiting in the noblest sense, through whose presence [deren Gegenwart, whose wait towards ...] toward the coming the word is reached into the answer of the human essence and thus brought into language.

THE ELDER: Then indeed the people of poets and thinkers would be in a unique sense the waiting people.⁶⁵

The Volk waits because of its poeticality and it waits in relation to the essence of the human. It is, however, essentially backward with regard to its own essence. As it is always awaiting itself, it is unable to submit itself in its presence to the manipulation of τεχνη and thus preserves the human in its essential distance from reification. Heidegger suggests that the inviolability of this people lies in its absence:

THE YOUNGER: The people that is waiting would necessarily be for the others even quite useless, because that which always simply waits and forever awaits the coming, yields nothing tangible that could be of use for progress and the upswing of the performance curve or for the expeditious course of business.⁶⁶

This people is not so much waiting for something as waiting away from something. It is a people that waits precisely in order not to be the people whose essence is present-at-hand. Heidegger's Volk is the people of mimesis and of the treason of Hölderlin's "false priest".⁶⁷ It waits in order not to produce. It waits against presence in order not to emulate its neighbours' obliviousness to the undecidability of Being in the prosecution of the extant. A people that does not wait — that Being abandons to presence — is a people without a future and without a past. For Heidegger, industrialisation is not a plan for the future of a people, but rather a means for abolishing the future in favour of the nihilism of that which is solely present. Being is lost to view behind material, which remains fundamentally the same whether it is accumulated in "peace" or devastated in "war".

In a lecture delivered in Konstanz at the end of 1934, "The Current State and the Future Task of German Philosophy", Heidegger reserves the notions of mission and task for the people that does not simply occupy itself with the extant:

Been-ness [Gewesenheit] is the might of the mission, the future is the might of the task. Only if, intimating our mission, we grapple to ourselves our task, are we truly able to be contemporary [gegenwärtig]. Whoever simply cultivates that which is at hand, and has forgotten the mission and thus falsified the task into a quantifiable profit, he is not contemporary — on the contrary, he is merely lost within the prevailing today.⁶⁸

The conservatism that voices itself in such passages is, strictly speaking, a conservatism of the Nothing, of the non-reified. The German people must recover itself in the originarity of the Nothing in ecstatic temporality.

Heidegger's disillusionment with National Socialism issues arguably from a disappointed faith in the movement's ability to bring about an understanding of Dasein as the "Platzhalter des Nichts". All its proclamations of opposition to modernity and to the materialism of its neighbours were, in the end, merely "aesthetic". National Socialism aestheticised politics, but it did so in the service of the forgetfulness of Being. The distance that opened between its proclamations and the reality of its materialism was not the distance that opens in the work of art as the possibility of understanding Being other than as presence. The lies of the regime were all too easily followed back to their "idea". In other words, their distance from their reality was only comprehensible as their subordination in a politics of expediency. The "aestheticism" attributed to the NSDAP belongs to a vulgar Platonism.

Habermas, in his preface to the German translation of Farías' Heidegger et le nazisme, is too eager to mistake the nature of Heidegger's "aesthetic" conservatism and to override the question of its assimilability with National Socialism. He writes: "The crude nationalism Heidegger openly sustained even after 1933 remains, in a form more or less sublimated through Hölderlin, an invariant feature of his thought."⁶⁹ But how can that which is sublimated remain crude? What does "sublimation" mean here? For Habermas, the crudity of Heidegger's nationalism in 1933 is its compatibility with the nationalism of the regime. National Socialism is peremptorily presented as the intrinsically crude essence of German nationalism and, inasmuch as Heidegger addresses the notion of the German people in his commentaries on Hölderlin, he is said to retain his allegiance to the NSDAP. The criticisms that Heidegger directs at the regime on account of its deficient sense of the specificity of the German people are thereby dismissed. Yet, for Heidegger, the commentaries on Hölderlin do not constitute a sublimation of his nationalism, but rather its most lucid expression. By refusing a nationalist critique of National Socialism, Habermas is seemingly (and characteristically) only able to object to the regime on the basis of its insufficient universality. Whereas for Heidegger the regime is not specific enough, for Habermas it was not universal enough. Habermas here repeats an objection that already sounded within the party during the last days of the war.⁷⁰ Given the global self-conception of the movement, it could be said that, in the frustration of its territorial ambitions, National Socialism was for itself insufficiently National Socialist. It had always been an unwilling simulacrum of itself, because it was forever having to will the execution of its self-conception against its own partiality. In siding with the universal, Habermas implicitly has recourse to an understanding of the will to power scarcely less degraded than that propagated by the National Socialists. Everything is to be judged by its powers of expansion, its universalisability. The crudity of a nationalism such as that of National Socialism is much less a matter of purity than of a carelessness with respect to its own opposition to the international. This crudity, as Habermas terms it, furthermore does not admit of sublimation in the Freudian sense, since in its incoherence there cannot be discerned the immediate object from which desire might be more or less comfortably diverted to the “cultural” phenomenon of Hölderlin’s poetry. By not questioning the immediacy (crudity) of the political and the mediacy (sublimation) of the poetic, Habermas foregoes a criticism of the universalist foundations of the nationalism of the NSDAP.

Once the political has been demarcated as the field of the struggle for recognition as the universal, the essential specificity of the Volk becomes apolitical. The resulting apoliticality of the specificity of the Volk denotes, not simply a neglect of the question of the essence of the Volk, but also an impoverishment of the concept of the political itself.

A politics of the universal is political only in spite of itself, since the universality towards which it strives constitutes the extirpation of the political: the openness of the polis is to be replaced with the constrictedness of the oikos in which the universal exercises its paternalism unchallenged.⁷¹ The people composing the public realm, and in its essential specificity forever opening a distance from the universal, is the Un-thought of the struggle for power. The openness of the people is likewise its furtiveness, because the definitive politicality of its historical specificity renders it invisible within the nihilistic struggle for power.

Of the uncanny guardians of the openness of the political — the poets and thinkers, priests and rulers who are the true founders of the State — Heidegger writes in An Introduction to Metaphysics:

Pre-eminent in the historical place, they become at the same time apolis, without city and place, lonely, strange [Un-heimliche], and alien, without exit amid the entirety of beings, at the same time without statute and limit, without structure and order, because they themselves as creators must first create all this.⁷²

Occurring in a commentary on Antigone, this passage defines the creator of the polis rather than reflects on the amorality of the tyrant. The creators of the polis stand outside the polis as the field of the struggle for power. Their creativity is negative: they found the polis, but they found it in the openness of that which has not yet been created, i.e. fully determined and rendered positive. The “apoliticality” of these creators is the condition of possibility for the statutes and limits, structures and orders under which the openness of the political nonetheless disappears from view. They are apolis, without city and place, but for that very reason they are not at the mercy of the homelessness of the universal. The polis first grounds itself in their refusal of the struggle for power just as the universal grounds itself in the refusal of the polis. The strangeness of the creators — their Un-heimlichkeit — is the corollary of their originarity and unrecognisability within the universalist light of presence.

Heidegger's commentaries on Hölderlin in the thirties and early forties address the uncanniness of the originary. In these texts, Heidegger's nationalism, as an attention to the uncanniness of the originary, is at odds with the self-certain nationalism of the NSDAP. Habermas is by no means alone in not drawing the distinction between these two nationalisms. Thus a commentator such as Kommerell, forgetting his reservations concerning the regime, can write of the notion of the people in Hölderlin:

The doctrine that a century finds intolerable is the doctrine of which it stands in the greatest need. In ours Hölderlin's occupies this position: when a people is truly a people, its war is a holy war. Just as the individual through beauty or great deeds enters upon its higher reality, so does a people through war; indeed it requires an opponent in order to glorify itself.⁷³

Hölderlin here becomes the poet of Hitlerian nationalism. The poetry that, for Heidegger, promises the nationalism of the Un-thought of nihilism, promises, for Kommerell, military expansion and the struggle for recognition. Irrespective of his affection and esteem for Kommerell, Heidegger is consistent in his antagonism toward such "politicisations" of the work of art.

In the collection of notes published under the title Besinnung, Heidegger asserts that the work of art is as alien to the National Socialist realm of the struggle for recognition as it had been earlier to the interiority of bourgeois criticism:

It remains essentially withdrawn as much from the “public” as from “private” play, belonging solely to the persistence in the decline [Untergang] that alone can become a history in keeping with the essential, and that leaves in its wake a clearing of Being.⁷⁴

The work of art commits itself neither to internal migration nor public spectacle. It is withdrawn from the choice between the individual in its Cartesian isolation and the universal of the deracinated masses. Persisting in its decline and thus its finitude, the work of art eludes the abstraction from historicity by which the autonomous subject and the “they” are alike determined. The essential decline of the work of art is the originary of its other understanding of Being. It declines in transcending its presence and, through decline, it retires from the struggle for recognition. The work of art never gives itself up to be apprehended in the light of presence. It is originary that renders it too frail for the struggle, because power, as Heidegger continues, is the property of the derivative:

Only now in the history of humanity does the obliviousness of Being come to its position of total power. But what if this abandonment of beings by Being were the beginning of an originary history in which Being [Sein] is Beyng [Seyn], so that the actual in its ever greater actuality would be ever more hopelessly cast out from Being, from Beyng as refusal, to which no power and no supremacy could be equal because they must necessarily and always mistake the essence of the utterly power-less. The powerless can never be deprived of power. This, however, is not attributed to it as a deficiency. On the contrary, it is merely a consequence — and one not even necessary and fitting — of its nobility.⁷⁵

The originary is always misjudged in its powerlessness because it has not the “strength” to reduce itself to presence. Hölderlin, who speaks of tragedy as a revelation of the originary in its weakness⁷⁶, speaks likewise of the revelatory caesura of tragedy⁷⁷: the originary shows itself in letting “nothing” appear. By the criteria of technicism, the originary is deficient because beings have not yet come to the presence on which their manipulability rests. Hölderlin, as the poet of weakness, is, for Heidegger, the poet of the impossibility of National Socialism. He is the poet of the Un-thought of the movement’s nihilism. In the 1931-2 lecture course On the Essence of Truth: Plato’s Parable of the Cave and Theaetetus, Hölderlin is not even included in a list of great poets.⁷⁸ Although Heidegger had been familiar with Hölderlin’s texts since 1908⁷⁹, it is only after 1933 that the poet of modesty becomes the essential poet.

In this regard, Heidegger’s reading of Hölderlin displays less of an affinity with Kommerell than with Benjamin’s early text “Two Poems by Friedrich Hölderlin”, with its depiction of the passivity at the centre of the hymns.⁸⁰ Moreover, a complementarity could be said to exist between Benjamin’s and Heidegger’s readings: for the one, passivity alone is able to serve as a point of mediation and occupy the centre, because, for the other, weakness is the essence of the originary. Inasmuch as the centre is reserved for the weak, a nationalism unavailable to National Socialism is to be heard in the concluding strophe of Hölderlin’s hymn “Germanien” with its interpretation of the geographical centrality of Central Europe:

Yet at the centre of Time
 In peace with hallowed,
 With virginal Earth lives Aether
 And gladly, for remembrance, they

The never-needy dwell
 Hospitably amid the never-needy,
 Amid your holidays,
 Germania, where you are priestess and Defenceless proffer all round
 Advice to the kings and the peoples.⁸¹

The paranoia and megalomania of National Socialism are missing from Hölderlin's patriotism. Germany occupies the centre neither as the common object of the rapacity of her neighbours nor as the seat of a military empire. Instead, defencelessly Germany gives counsel to the kings and the peoples assembled around her in the feast.

Germany is the priestess among the nations and must remain such for their sake as much as for her own. For Heidegger, the essence of the German people is not to be one people among others, but rather to be the people of the essential. The eschatological pretensions of National Socialism concerning the German people are shadowed in Heidegger's writings by the elaboration of the mission of the German people in the history of Being. To repeat an excerpt from the lecture course Heraklit:

The planet is in flames. The essence of humanity is out of joint. Only from the Germans, assuming that they find and defend what it is that is German, can the world-historical sobriety come.

The German essence is to be found in the task of "priestess" among the nations. Through bringing themselves into conformity with their essence, the German people serve the other peoples as their "priests".

But that which is specific to the Germans seemingly becomes a universal in the context of their world-mission as priests of the peoples. The world-mission of the Germans defines itself, however, against the universal and defines “das Deutsche” without concession to the recognisability of the people of National Socialism. Since the universal is that which presupposes a neglect of “das Eigene”, of namely that by which Heidegger defines “das Deutsche”, the “universality” of the world-mission of the Germans is entirely negative and is to be situated properly in the target of its consternation. The sobriety that will come over the world from out of a discovery and defence of that which is German will not be the sobriety of unlimited rational communication. It will be the sobriety of an insight into “das Eigene”, into the transcendence proper to Dasein as it is secured in the mimesis and technicist incompetence of the holy heart of the peoples. The world-mission of the Germans is to “instantiate” the transcendent, and hence the unrepeatable and non-global, in a confrontation with the globalism of τεχνη. In his commentary on Hölderlin’s hymn “Germanien”, Heidegger develops his notion of the priest as the tender of the Un-thought of τεχνη:

Just as at the beginning of the flight of the gods it is the priest who is first affected (it goes without saying that it is not ministers of the established churches who are in question), likewise for a new advent of the gods a priest or a priestess must again be the first affected, awaiting, hidden and unknown, the messengers of the gods, so that temple, image and custom might lovingly follow them. If that does not occur, then regardless of aircraft, radio and conquest of the stratosphere the peoples will tumble irretrievably towards their end. If matters are to turn out differently, then the gods-lessness [Götterlosigkeit] of historical Dasein in its entirety must first be experienced, i.e. Dasein must be open to such experience and if it is not, it must be made so, precisely by those who truly endure the flight of the gods. They are the ones who doubt, the legend of that which has been dawns and darkens [dämmert] about their heads, and they are those of which not one of them knows what is happening to them, while the self-certain and robust know-alls always know what happens to them, as they punctiliously take care that nothing at all can happen to them.⁸²

The sobriety that will come from the German people is the questioning of the priest.⁸³ The priest introduces hesitation into the self-assurance of technicism, but not in order to temper this self-assurance, to see it vindicated in a more encompassing success. The doubt of the priest restores τεχνη to its essence in the originarity of doubt. This involves less the abolition of the tool than its fracture, since the doubt of the priest is not a call to return to an ethnologically fantastic toolless society, but is instead the anticipation of the recovery from the reductionism of τεχνη into its essence as world.⁸⁴

Germany is the priestess among the nations only so long as she is the “incompetent” among the nations. Her hesitation before τεχνη is the feast day on which the nations assemble around her. In the lecture course Hölderlin’s Hymn “Andenken”, Heidegger reviews the conventionally negative definitions of the holiday:

Celebrating the feast [feiern] means in the first place: not working. It can thus come about that the feast days stand in exclusive relation to workdays, that they are an interruption in the time of work and a change in the routine of labour, and ultimately a pause introduced solely for the benefit of work.⁸⁵

The cessation of labour is however an inessential definition of the holiday:

Now the cessation of work is no longer essence and ground of the celebration of the feast. On the contrary, it is already a consequence of that catching of oneself which seemingly brings human beings back only to their egos, but which in truth transposes them out into that region to which their essence clings. Wonder begins or else terror.⁸⁶

The feast day is recuperative, not because it allows human beings to replenish the stores of energy expended in labour, but because it exposes Dasein to its essential possibilities of wonder and terror in the face of the worlding of the world. Like the work of art, the feast day is the essence of that which the broken, missing or inappropriate tool is only accidentally. Alluding to the sun in Plato's parable of the cave, Heidegger writes:

At the time of the festival and on feast days, the proper [das Eigene], the ground itself of history, comes purely to appearance; but that which appears is there not an object for observation, that which appears [das Erscheinende] is a shining [ein Scheinen] in the sense in which we say: the sun shines.⁸⁷

The sun that shines on the feast day is the Un-thought of τεχνη. World, in its originary, weakness illuminates Dasein and every tool discovers itself as essentially broken, missing or inappropriate. No longer ready-to-hand, the tool reveals its essence in the temple. The temple is the work of art that raises itself on the feast day in its distance from labour's immersion in presence. In this distance from presence lies its title to mimesis and thus to the name of art. The feast day, with its focus on the temple, is the recollection of the unsettling origin of the everyday: “Celebrating the feast is a becoming free from the usual through a becoming free for the unusual.”⁸⁸ This becoming free for the unusual is the beginning of wonder or terror. The feast day is never entirely distinguishable from misfortune, from the uncanniness of the originary rupture in which the world of a people worlds.

Heidegger’s definitions of the work of art and the feast day are both directed towards the Un-thought of τέχνη. The work of art and the feast day are a failure of the self-certainty of τέχνη and it is within this failure that a people becomes the people of poets and thinkers. Incompetence is the essence of art’s revelation. This proposition, implicit in Heidegger, is explicit in Kafka. Josephine in the tale “Josephine the Singer, or the Mouse Folk” cannot sing, yet it is precisely her failure as an artist — the discrepancy between her claims and her achievement — that reveals her people to themselves and binds them to her. Kafka writes of the nature of her performances:

And indeed this is all expressed not in full round tones but softly, in whispers, confidentially, sometimes a little hoarsely. Of course it is a kind of piping. Why not? Piping is our people’s daily speech, only many a one pipes his whole life long and does not know it, where here piping is set free from the fetters of daily life and it sets us free too for a little while.⁸⁹

Josephine’s voice rediscovers the world in which the piping of the mice has its place. It does so, not because it is more than a piping, but because it claims to be more. It is an instrument that is inappropriate to its task, and in this distance from its concept, in its abject subordination to its ἰδέα, Josephine’s piping is, in Plato’s sense, art. Josephine is able to impose on not a single one of the listeners gathered around her. She is even encouraged in the extravagant claims of her art, regardless of the danger to which she at times exposes her people:

Josephine exerts herself, a mere nothing in voice, a mere nothing in execution, she asserts herself and gets across to us; it does us good to think of that. A really trained singer, if ever such a one should be found among us, we could certainly not endure at such a time and we should unanimously turn away from the senselessness of any such performance. May Josephine be spared from perceiving that the mere fact of our listening to her is proof that she is no singer.⁹⁰

Josephine is considered an artist among the mice only so long as she fails to sing. The failure is the essence of her art. For Plato and Kafka, the artist is the one who fails the most conspicuously.

Certainly National Socialism failed to substantiate its claims, but inasmuch as its failure came through its defeat at the hands of other powers, its distance from its idea did not become the occasion of the question of the Un-thought of metaphysics. Instead, this failure became the (still prevailing) argument for the claims of its Western conquerors: liberal democracy, within a politics unavowably indebted to Nietzsche's inverted Platonism, proceeded to consummate its relations with its idea. To be the Volk of poets and thinkers is to be the people that fails — as clearly as possible — of itself. Germany, as the land of poets and thinkers, is the land of industrial backwardness. Its poetry and its thought are not to be registered in any accumulation of volumes in the world's libraries, but rather in its failure to execute the actions by which the economies of other nations are sustained. Heidegger and Kafka are both of the conviction that if failure is to be grasped as such, it can be neither contemptuously dismissed nor blunderingly affirmed.

It is between these two misinterpretations that Heidegger's commentary on Hölderlin's understanding of Germany in Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein" must be read:

The poet does not mean that Germany of those poets and thinkers as the rest of the world imagines and wishes them: the simple dreamers and innocents who then at decisive moments are easily persuaded and made into fools for everyone else; rather he means that poetizing and thinking which plunges into the abysses of Being, not content with the shallow waters of a universal world-reason, that poetizing and thinking which in the work brings the being new and primordially to appearance and to a stand.⁹¹

Germany is the land of poets and thinkers because it is the land that can only ever dream of what it might be. Heidegger is not arguing against the discrepancy so much as against the inability of nihilism to grasp and maintain the discrepancy. Nihilism mistakes for the validation of τεχνη the failure of poetry and thought that as failure is to contest the hegemony of τεχνη. This ambiguity is a consequence of the undecidable ontological status of failure. It is in this ambiguity that Heidegger's nationalism exhibits its irreducibility to National Socialism and likewise forgoes an open confrontation. It limits itself to failing before the will to power.

IV Towards the Uncanny Homeland

In a manuscript from 1796 Hegel delimits the mythologies then acceptable to the tastes of the German reading public and concludes with the question:

Is Judaea, then, the Teutons' Fatherland?¹

For National Socialism, such a question was strictly unutterable. But that the question could never have been enunciated does not mean that it went unanswered. Finding itself incapable of establishing the living national mythology upon whose absence Hegel reflects, National Socialism declared that the Germans indeed possessed a fatherland that lay elsewhere and that the name of this unheimliche Heimat was Greece. At the very time when the Greece that had been degraded into the paradise of anti-Semites announced itself in the sullen clumsiness of Speer's architecture, in the callisthenics of an embryonic Wehrmacht and in a bookish and expedient paganism, Heidegger was lecturing upon the necessity for the German people of a confrontation with classical Greece. The simultaneity is not fortuitous. Heidegger's texts of the late thirties and early forties are distinguished by a heightened tone of opposition towards the legacy of Greek thought: Greece, without ever being confounded with its National Socialist travesties, is set forth as that which must be overcome. Since the imperialism and spectacle by which National Socialism recreated for itself a distinctly Roman antiquity were, according to Heidegger, nothing but a consequence of an increasingly pernicious complacency regarding Greek thought, it is in an interrogation and destruction of the latter that "the other beginning" (der andere Anfang) might be anticipated and the forgetfulness of Being retrieved. In itself, a return to Greece would not be a solution to nihilism. Greece is to be made to give way to its Un-thought.

For Heidegger, the name of this Un-thought is Being. Asking after that which was not revealed in Greece, Heidegger does not ask simply after that which was revealed elsewhere. That which has been revealed elsewhere is still too Greek by virtue of its having been revealed at all. To bring to the confrontation with classical Greece a positive content with a different genealogy is to conceive the confrontation within the terms of the Greek privileging of the visible. Such a confrontation is decided in advance in the favour of Greece. And as the confrontation with Greece implies a confrontation with the neoclassicism of the NSDAP, nobody should be surprised that Heidegger did not oppose a warmed-up liberal humanism to the movement's warmed-up paganism. What Heidegger ranges against the legacy of Greece is the concealed as such. In place of the visibility of beings in ἀληθεια, Heidegger invokes the prohibition on images.

By asking after the non-Greek, Heidegger puts the whole of the West in question, and yet he does so with a question by which the West has likewise come to define itself. The question, as it has been raised against metaphysics by Luther and Kierkegaard as the definitive question concerning the essence of Christianity, is the question of the other, namely, Judaic origin of the West. Denying this other origin and endeavouring to demonstrate its independence from Judaea, National Socialism slavishly courted a resemblance to Greece. Anti-Semitism can be suspected not only in the movement's neoclassicism, but also, beyond its aesthetics, in the general, obsessive cultivation of the visible. The dilemma of National Socialism was that the German people could assert themselves, in their originarity as a people of the West, solely as either Greek or Jewish. National Socialism did not invent this dilemma: it is prefigured in the eighteenth century in that bifurcation of the national literature into Weimar classicism and Christian romanticism on which Hegel, among others, comments. At stake in the contest between the visibility of Greece and the invisibility of Judaea is the definition of the German Volk. The Volk is the people of the impossibility of the West. That which is specific to this people, that which it can receive as a possession neither from the Greeks nor from the Jews, is the contradiction itself between the visible and the invisible. To attend to its specificity, this people has to grasp, without mitigation, the unity of this discord. The Volk finds itself in the confrontation with Greece, not as the Other of Greece, but as the confrontation itself. If it is “at home” in the non-Greek, it is in order, however, to enact the confrontation with Greece that is proper to it. The Volk must become Jewish in order to become itself. In defiance of National Socialism, it must counterbalance the fixation on the visible by plunging into the invisible: it has to think the unnamability of Judaea.²

As little as it understood Greece, National Socialism was still too Greek to be German. That the movement failed to be German had less to do with its neoclassical aesthetics and anti-Christian rhetoric than with its ensnarement in the categories of classical ontology. National Socialism was too Greek to grasp the irreducibility of the world of the Volk to metaphysics. The movement’s trumpeted rootedness in a self-evident homeland does not differentiate it from Greece, since this rootedness was not seen to be incompatible with the extendable space of Lebensraum. The quantifiable and culturally indifferent territory of the National Socialist Heimat remained modelled on the homogeneous space of classical geometry. Heidegger’s question in the late thirties and early forties concerning “the other beginning” does not issue, as might have been expected from its precedents, in a moral or religious critique of National Socialism. Instead, it gives rise to an immanent critique of National Socialism’s abortive nationalism, since it is with “the other beginning” and the overcoming of metaphysics that the homeland can at last be thought. The otherness of “the other beginning” is the chance it provides, in the context of the prevailing homelessness of nihilism, of thinking the homeland as such.

Is Judaea to become the fatherland of the Germans? Heidegger does not speak of a confrontation with the Jewish people, but inasmuch as he speaks of a confrontation with the Greeks, he aspires to the radical differentiation of the German people that would render a confrontation practicable. The Germans are to become other than Greeks, when within the history of the West it has always been the Jews who have counted as the definitive non-Greeks. Heidegger's Germans resemble the Jews not only in their character of being different from the Greeks, but also in the way that they are different. Through defining the Volk by its resistance to the positivism of its neighbours, Heidegger brings the essence of the Germans into contact with the people of the prohibition on images. And yet Heidegger does not acknowledge the contact. He does not admit that his conception of the Volk has a model, but then the possibility of an Auseinandersetzung with Greece requires a disavowal of the Platonic logic of the subordination to the Idea. Once the Volk has a model, once Judaea is a model, positivism and the Greek privileging of the visible and the present reassert themselves.

Certainly it cannot be said against Heidegger that he was an open advocate of the extermination (to have erased the Jewish model physically would not have liberated the Volk from its last trace of positivism, since the definition of the Volk would then have been dependent, implicitly if not explicitly, on the fact of Auschwitz). What remains in question is whether Heidegger's silence on the Jews positions them alongside the many other peoples who, viewed within the history of Being, are seemingly expendable or whether that silence functions as a disavowal of the Jews' excessive proximity to his conception of the Volk. Lyotard in Heidegger and "the jews", his response to the controversy provoked by Fariás' publication Heidegger et le nazisme, ascribes to Europe as a whole a constitutive disavowal of the "jews", of which Auschwitz would be the absolute manifestation. Lyotard recognises that he himself cannot therefore escape this disavowal and that he must admit this continually through the use of scare quotes. But the senses in which Lyotard speaks of disavowal are inconsistent. Auschwitz will always have come too late for its disavowal of the “jews” not to be superfluous, since it can mount only a grotesquely ontic re-enactment of the West’s initial scene, substituting European Jewry for the unnameable “...” of the constitutive disavowal of primal repression: the “jews”, in Lyotard’s account, become (once again) a scapegoat. When Lyotard writes that “Vernichtung, the Nazi name for annihilation, is not so different from foreclosure, Verleugnung”³, he overlooks the incompatibility of the respective “objects” of extermination and primal repression. The hubris of National Socialism, and the error in which Lyotard fails to catch it out, was that it sought to achieve a transformation of the ontological ground of the West by an eradication of the ontic traces of a people and culture. National Socialism underestimated the proximity of Judaea. It believed that the Being of the West was not contaminated and that the work of purification — because it need concern itself only with the domain of beings present-at-hand — was therefore feasible. Properly speaking, the regime did not disavow Judaea. Instead, it insisted on its reification, on its maintenance as a stable object within the field of perception in defiance of the prohibition on images by which Judaea has marked the West. Disavowal is not incidental to the Judaea that has created the West and that the West has created for itself, since Judaea exists as the exception to the ontic. Christianity’s irreducibility to metaphysics harbours itself in this exception and thinks it as interiority. The existential analytic of Dasein in Being and Time will constitute a critique of the subjectivization of this exception, but it will stop short of abandoning the proximality attributed to it in Judeo-Christian thought. That which is ownmost, for Judeo-Christian thought and for Heidegger, is that which is not assimilable to the thingly. The exception to the hegemony of the ontic carries with it in its Judeo-Christian definition the chance of understanding the nearness of the homeland. Heidegger’s nationalism depends thus for its viability on Judaea. An exposition of Heidegger’s Semitism cannot mitigate the odiousness of his occasional anti-Semitic utterances. At best it can announce the nature and problematic provenance of the question that Heidegger sought to address in his meditations on the Volk and on the fatherland.

Under the cover of the agonistic Hellenism he shares with Hölderlin, Heidegger writes of the fatherland in terms more suggestive of the Jewish Diaspora than of the National Socialist uprising.⁴ In the 1941-2 course on Hölderlin's poem "Andenken", there appears the following:

That which is most our own [das Eigenste], the Fatherland, is the highest, but it stands for that reason under the heaviest prohibition. Thus only at the end will it be found, after protracted searching, after many sacrifices and severe exertions. [...] The national [das Vaterländische] is found only if the highest is sought. Seeking the highest means keeping quiet about it.⁵

The fatherland, as the highest, stands under the heaviest prohibition. For Heidegger, it is prohibited to find the fatherland too easily. The fatherland is the highest because it is that which is most proper to us, and as that which is most proper to us it can never be found in the way that something merely present-at-hand is found. It will be found, if at all, as missing from the realm of the thingly. In the realm of the thingly, the fatherland is found as that for which we must seek — the goal of the Germans is, for Heidegger in the 1937-8 lecture course Grundfragen der Philosophie, the search itself.⁶

Inasmuch as Heidegger's fatherland lies outside the scope of classical ontology, it recalls the missing homeland of Franz Rosenzweig's The Star of Redemption:

To the eternal people, home never is home in the sense of land, as it is to the peoples of the world who plough the land and live and thrive on it, until they have all but forgotten that being a people means something besides being rooted in a land. [...] In the most profound sense possible, this people has a land of its own only in that it has a land it yearns for — a holy land. And so even when it has a home, this people, in recurrent contrast to all other peoples on earth, is not allowed full possession of that home. It is only “a stranger and a sojourner.”⁷

The land of this people never fully surrenders itself to possession. It is to be found as yearning and not as property, as ουσία. At the end of the First World War, Rosenzweig writes from within the millenary absence of a Jewish state, whereas Heidegger, two decades later, employs the same topos of the missing homeland at the zenith of German imperialism. How is the similarity to be understood? As an instance of the expropriation of Jewish property under Hitler or as sabotage of the objectives of the Wannsee Conference by means of a Verjudung of the essence of the fatherland? Both, in a secondary sense, are at issue. And that both might be at issue is because Heidegger, following Hölderlin, believes that the Germans are compelled to seek out a way to differentiate themselves from the Greeks. Hölderlin’s texts and Heidegger’s commentaries can be read for what they say regarding the necessary and promised non-Hellenism of the German people. Only once this task of differentiation has been outlined will it be possible to query to what degree both Hölderlin and Heidegger admit of rediscovery within the literature of the Jewish Diaspora. Of course, such an admittedly strained interpretation simply inverts Rosenberg’s fatuous image of Hölderlin as a proto-Nazi⁸: what is properly at stake is a treatment of the essence of the national overlooked by the Greeks and never even suspected by National Socialism.

Heidegger’s reiterated objection to National Socialism was that it was insufficiently national. The so-called politicisation of every sphere under the regime did not hesitate to style itself as Greek and to assume that the essence of the political exhaustively revealed itself in classical Greece. In the 1942 lecture course Hölderlin's Hymn "The Ister", Heidegger criticises the classical scholarship of the period for conflating the Greeks and the NSDAP:

Today — if one still reads such books at all — one can scarcely read a treatise or book on the Greeks without everywhere being assured that here, with the Greeks, “everything” is “politically” determined. In the majority of “research results,” the Greeks appear as the pure National Socialists.⁹

For Heidegger, these works are unjust both to the Greeks and to the National Socialists. The specific task of a German nationalist uprising is overlooked and Greece is misrepresented as the model of the Nazi mobilisation. It is simply assumed in these works that the political determination of everything that is draws the Greeks and the National Socialists together. The failure to understand the political, notwithstanding its compulsive invocation, that Heidegger observes in his contemporaries is a deficiency that he then proceeds to attribute, albeit to a lesser degree, to the Greeks themselves. The authentic understanding of the essence of the political depends on a revelation of the essence of the πολις:

Who says that the Greeks, because they “lived” in the πολις, were also in the clear as to the essence of the πολις? Perhaps the name πολις is precisely the word for that realm that constantly became questionable anew, remained worthy of question, made necessary and indeed needed certain decisions whose truth on each occasion displaced the Greeks into the realm of the groundless or the inaccessible. If we therefore ask: What is the πολις of the Greeks? then we must not presuppose that the Greeks must have known this, as though all we had to do were to enquire among them.¹⁰

The πολις resists historiographical reconstruction from the utterances of the ancient Greeks; it resists it because the πολις is the precondition of these utterances. Heidegger further writes of the πολις:

It is neither merely state, nor merely city, rather in the first instance it is properly “the stead” [die Statt]: the site [die Stätte] of the abode of human history that belongs to humans in the midst of beings.¹¹

The πολις is thus that which, for Heidegger, has to understood more fundamentally as the clearing of Being:

The pre-political essence of the πολις, that essence that first makes possible everything political in the original and in the derivative sense, lies in its being the open site of that fitting destining [Schickung] from out of which all human relations towards beings — and that always means in the first instance the relations of beings as such to humans — are determined.¹²

Again, in the 1942-3 lecture course Parmenides, Heidegger speaks of the πολις in this way:

The πολις is the essence of the place [Ort], or, as we say, it is the settlement [Ort-schaft] of the historical dwelling of Greek humanity. Because the πολις lets the totality of beings come in this or that way into the unconcealedness of its condition, the πολις is therefore essentially related to the Being of beings. Between πολις and “Being” there is a primordial relation.¹³

This interpretation of the πολις as the clearing of Being follows from and illuminates a fragment by Hölderlin that Heidegger quotes:

do you think

It will proceed
 Along the course of old? Namely they wanted to found
 A realm of art. But thereby
 The national [das Vaterländische] was neglected
 By them and pitifully
 Greece, the fairest of all, was destroyed.
 Now presumably matters
 Stand otherwise.¹⁴

For Hölderlin, the Greeks neglected the national. For Heidegger, that which the Greeks neglected, namely the essence of the πολις as the site of their historical Dasein, they could not but have neglected without a contestation of classical ontology. In the 1934-5 lecture course Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein", the conjunction receives its sharpest form:

The “Fatherland” is Being [das Seyn] itself.¹⁵

The imperative that informs Heidegger’s destruction of the ontological tradition is the task of addressing the national. So long as the hegemony of the ontic remains unchallenged and Being unthought, even the most vehemently proclaimed patriotic renewal will amount to a dereliction of the fatherland. In the history of Being, National Socialism figures as cosmopolitan.

As the fatherland is explicitly associated with the central question in Heidegger’s thinking, it cannot be interpreted as a non-philosophical residue in an otherwise stringent corpus.¹⁶ However aphoristically Heidegger speaks of the fatherland, he does so within the context of his elaboration of the question of Being, rather than in the form of asides. Having been identified with Being (das Seyn), and thus with the Un-thought of the Greeks and the hegemony of the ontic, the word “Fatherland” is differentiated from the jargon of the regime. The degree of difference is easily underestimated given the cursory nature of Heidegger’s presentation, and it is thus not redundant to set out this difference at greater length. It has first to be asked on what grounds Heidegger identifies the fatherland with Being. Between the discourses of nationalism and metaphysics there is no obvious transition. Heidegger is clearly saying more than that the fatherland is the central term of nationalism in the same way that Being is the central term of metaphysics — he does not point out a structural symmetry that would keep the discourses at issue here distinct but names Being as that which defines the fatherland. The fatherland is what it is only as Being, because whatever originarity to which the fatherland can lay claim, it claims as the originarity of Being. The fatherland of conventional nationalism, which marks itself off straightforwardly from other countries as the country of origin, has to dispute with Being for the title to the originary. In this dispute, conventional nationalism finds its claims rebuffed.

Why this should be so and why the fatherland has in the end to be understood as Being is the import of Heidegger's treatment of Being-in-the-world in Being and Time. Already in the text of 1927 the origin of Dasein is shown to lie elsewhere than among beings. As Being-in-the-world, Dasein cannot have its origin — in the sense of its ground — in any being present-at-hand. In the distinctness of a geographically determinate fatherland Dasein would be unable to recognise the ground of its own status as an exception to the ontology of the distinct. It has to turn instead to the world in which the distinct first appears and that thus precedes the fatherland of conventional nationalism. Where National Socialism neglected the ontic indeterminability of world in favour of a fatherland with border controls and commissions for cartographers, it subscribed to classical ontology and the apprehensibility of what is. The fatherland, in the thingliness whereby it was recognisable, was also discovered to be manipulable and to lend itself to expansion. For the purpose of thinking that which is most our own, National Socialism had at its disposal only relics of the Dingbegriffe of classical ontology. Heidegger, by contrast, conceives that which is most our own as the Unthought of τεχνη and hence of that planetary domination under which the "inner truth" of National Socialism was forgotten. The inner truth of the movement was the truth constituted by the ownmost (das Eigenste). Since neither among the Greeks nor among the later peoples sustained by their legacy was the originary ever grasped in its essence, it cannot justifiably be interpreted as the preserve of reactionaries. The originary, in the incomprehensibility with which it haunts τεχνη, is less the reassuring habitat of backward Luddites, than the still indiscernible site of the disclosedness of beings.

If, for Heidegger in 1934-5, the fatherland is Being itself, it is because the fatherland is the world of the Volk. The world in which the German people carries out its mission of thinking the question of Being is itself the clearing of Being. The conspicuous untimeliness of Heidegger's dictum in Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein” is not explained away by equating Being with the world of the Volk, since the use Heidegger makes elsewhere of “world” and “Volk” is itself untimely with relation to the nationalist discourse of the Nazi regime. Even though Heidegger never speaks of the fatherland in Being and Time, the basis for his definition of the fatherland in 1934-5 is to be discerned in the earlier text with its discussions of the ontological status of world and the worldliness of the Being-with-one-another of the Volk. Only as Being, i.e. only as the untimely Un-thought of the age of metaphysics is the fatherland truly the world of the Volk and not, for instance, an intraworldly (innerweltlich) object of exchange in the territorial struggles of Social Darwinism. As the world of the Volk, the fatherland is that which is at once closest and least tangible. Its proximity cannot be grasped as the proximity of an object present-at-hand, since as the clearing of beings in which an object first appears it is closer than any object. It is the condition of possibility for the closeness of an object. The proximity of the fatherland has to be grasped differently from the proximity of one object to another. It is in the way this difference is worked out, and in the question that thus arises concerning the scope of Dingbegriffe, that the fervour of Heidegger’s nationalism reveals itself as inimical to the Nazi regime and its metaphysical foundations.

The proximity of the fatherland is its originarity. For conventional nationalism, this originarity is unambiguously manifest in one’s country of origin. But does one’s country of origin truly stand on itself in distinction from that which is derivative and not originary? For Heidegger, the fatherland does not lie at any given moment at a greater or lesser distance in space from the Volk, since what is at issue is not a fixed point on the globe from and towards which one might move at will. The fatherland is originary not in the sense that it constitutes the backdrop of an act of parturition, but rather in the sense that its proximity is insuperable. In its originarity, the fatherland is that which is essentially nearest. The fatherland is the origin and thus whatever can be shown to be derivative is, ipso facto, not the fatherland. Heidegger's idiosyncratic nationalism is, accordingly, already in evidence in his destruction of the philosophical tradition. Once the tradition has been destroyed, once the ground of all previous philosophy has been laid bare, the originary, which is to say the fatherland, will have been secured. Nationalism, inasmuch as it takes the notion of originarity seriously, cannot evade the task of philosophical genealogy and must exclude the derivative from its definition of the fatherland.

In this respect, Kant's cosmopolitanism is a more rigorous nationalism than the territorial bigotry of the Nazis because it is more originary: the measurable Lebensraum of the latter presupposes the homogeneous space in which the Kantian subject asserts its rights as a citizen of the world. If Heidegger rejects this most philosophical of cosmopolitanisms, in turn, as derivative, it is without disputing its philosophical superiority over the sundry aborted nationalisms postdating the Critique of Pure Reason. For Heidegger, the insuperable proximity of the fatherland is not spatial because the fatherland is nearer than space itself, let alone any object contained within space, and it is nearer because, as Being (Sein), it is ontologically prior.

Heidegger's nationalism, and its pertinence to his thought as a whole, lies in an attempt to think the nearness of the nearest. As the nearest, the fatherland is necessarily Being in its originarity. Advancing such a definition, Heidegger is by no means ransacking the vocabulary of philosophy simply in order to furnish the Heimat of National Socialism with an ontological gloss. On the contrary, Heidegger thereby concisely states his opposition to the nationalism of the regime. Inasmuch as the Heimat of National Socialism — in its ready convertibility into Lebensraum — was the quantifiable territory of an organism and not Being, that which is essentially nearest to the Volk, and hence that which is the Volk itself, became a quantum. The reification of Dasein propagated in the biologism of the regime thereby had its counterpart in an understanding of the fatherland as an object in space. Whatever the quantitative aggrandisement of the fatherland through military expansion, the fatherland's initial debasement to an object within space, and thus to that which is doubly derivative, was not redressed. The fatherland of imperialist discourse, as it is more a geometrical figure than a Heimat, is inseparable from the theorisation of space established by the Greeks: both rest upon classical ontology's neglect of the essence of the πολις. This is why an opposition to imperialism that simply falls back upon the cosmopolitanism of the spatially indifferent is always inadequate. Where Heidegger criticises homogeneous space in the name of the many ways of Being, he does so, not in order to ground philosophically the otherwise rhetorical immediacy of a fetishised fatherland, but rather in order to interrogate in homogeneous space the ontological presuppositions of a reified fatherland. Since what identifies a Heimat is not a spatial immediacy but the nearness by which it is one's own, this nearness must be the matter of an existential analytic before it is, if at all, the matter of geometry.

The question of Being, as that which is existentially nearest, is the question of the Heimat of Dasein. Being-at-home, by which a Heimat is recognised as such, is thus, for Heidegger, an orientation within the question of Being. In this sense, orientation is not an orientation among objects but an orientation within the non-thingly. Heidegger's Heimat is recognisable as such by that which is not recognisable in it, by that which is uncanny. Orientation becomes an orientation by that which stands too close to be an object, and then not because it is the subject itself, since it is still closer than the subject. Any orientation that is a finding of oneself as a subject among and over against objects is thus, properly speaking, a disorientation, because the exception to the understanding of Being as presence, which is nearest to Dasein and by which Dasein has first of all to orientate itself, is forgotten. Orientation within the fatherland of Being is, conversely, a disorientation with regard to the objectivity of the objects in one's vicinity. Orientation within a fatherland that has been reified and subordinated to geometry proceeds by a mensuration between objects: it is less a being-at-home in what is closest to Dasein than an inclusion of Dasein in an inventory of the present-at-hand.

But, then, orientation within the homogeneous space that is the cosmopolitan subject's native element is also a forgetting of Dasein's Being, because homogeneity in general is inconceivable without a suppression of transcendence. Heidegger already formulates this objection to the originarity of homogeneous space in the covert treatment of the notion of the fatherland that is the existential analytic. To see how much of Heidegger's nationalism was in place by the late 1920s, and how little he received from the hands of the Nazis, the existential analytic can therefore be reread for what it says on orientation and that which is nearest to Dasein. Heidegger criticises there the cosmopolitanism of homogeneous space but without offering a premature defence of the parochialism of the Nazi regime. Criticising this cosmopolitanism in the course of his exposition of the phenomenon of orientation, Heidegger does not have recourse to the "realism" on which National Socialism prided itself and on which the practicality of orientation is conventionally believed to rely. On the contrary, Heidegger's criticism follows from a completely novel definition of orientation. Orientation within the question of Being replaces orientation within the "reality" of objects and the homogeneous space into which this "reality" must, as Kant had argued, collapse.

Heidegger's reading of Kant's text "What is Orientation in Thinking?" can easily give the impression of obtuseness because it does not share Kant's definition of orientation and cannot, accordingly, be seen to improve on it. For Heidegger, Dasein as Being-in-the-world is always already oriented and orientation, as it is set forth by Kant in his friendly critique of Mendelssohn's metaphysics, is but one mode of Dasein's Being-in-the-world. To explain orientation with reference to the subject is to risk all understanding of the worldly constitution of Dasein. In Being and Time, Heidegger repeats his objections from History of the Concept of Time to the meaningfulness of Kant's reconstruction of orientation from the difference between the left and right sides of the body:

Left and right are not something 'subjective' for which the subject has a feeling; they are directions of one's directedness into a world that is ready-to-hand already. 'By the mere feeling of a difference between my two sides' I could never find my way about in a world. The subject with a 'mere feeling' of this difference is a construct posited in disregard of the state that is truly constitutive for any subject — namely, that whenever Dasein has such a 'mere feeling', it is in a world already and must be in it to be able to orient itself at all. This becomes plain from the example with which Kant tries to clarify the phenomenon of orientation.

Suppose I step into a room which is familiar to me but dark, and which has been rearranged [umgeräumt] during my absence so that everything which used to be at my right is now at my left. If I am to orient myself the 'mere feeling of the difference' between my two sides will be of no help at all as long as I fail to apprehend some definite object 'whose position', as Kant remarks casually, 'I have in mind'. But what does this signify except that whenever this happens I necessarily orient myself both in and from my being already alongside a world which is 'familiar'? The equipment-context of a world must have been presented to Dasein. That I am already in a world is no less constitutive for the possibility of orientation than is the feeling for right and left. While this state of Dasein's Being is an obvious one, we are not thereby justified in suppressing the ontologically constitutive role which it plays. Even Kant does not suppress it, any more than any other Interpretation of Dasein. Yet the fact that this is a state of which we constantly make use, does not exempt us from providing a suitable ontological explication, but rather demands one. The psychological Interpretation according to which the “I” has something ‘in the memory’ [“im Gedächtnis”] is at bottom a way of alluding to the existentially constitutive state of Being-in-the-world. Since Kant fails to see this structure, he also fails to recognize all the interconnections which the Constitution of any possible orientation implies. Directedness with regard to right and left is based upon the essential directionality of Dasein in general, and this directionality in turn is essentially co-determined by Being-in-the-world. Even Kant, of course, has not taken orientation as a theme for Interpretation. He merely wants to show that every orientation requires a ‘subjective principle’. Here ‘subjective’ is meant to signify that this principle is a priori. Nevertheless, the a priori character of directedness with regard to right and left is based upon the ‘subjective’ a priori of Being-in-the-world, which has nothing to do with any determinate character restricted beforehand to a worldless subject.¹⁷

This passage needs to be read carefully. The difference between left and right, as it is a non-conceptual difference, too quickly becomes for Kant a matter of mere feeling. But that which Kant names a “feeling” cannot be reduced to the subject without contradiction. A worldless, hence bodyless subject is not able to feel a difference that in the circumstances simply does not exist. With its feeling for the difference between its two sides, the Kantian subject does not, strictly speaking, make sense of its world, since it is rather world that in advance makes sense for the Kantian subject of the difference between its two sides. There is therefore in Kant’s treatment of orientation something of the farce of the “discovery” of populated countries. Insensitive to its own Being-in-the-world, the Kantian subject discovers what has already been uncovered yet discovers it by nonetheless mistaking its nature. In other words, it successfully orientates itself within its world, not by grasping world as such, but rather by piecing together its feeling for the difference between its two sides and an object whose position it remembers. What the Kantian subject discovers in the moment of its re-orientation is that which was already “there” for it, albeit without the familiarity of the everyday. Orientation, in Kant’s account, ceases explicitly to be an existential mode of Dasein and becomes an epistemological problem for the subject.

Heidegger and Kant thus differ in the sense they give to finding oneself in the world. For the former, what is involved is an understanding of the world in which one finds oneself even as one is disoriented within it, whereas, for the latter, one finds oneself in the world at the moment one overcomes the disorientation by which one is seemingly outside the world. Presupposing its orientation as Being-in-the-world and yet turning aside from it as a question, the Kantian subject in its momentary and superficial disorientation searches among phenomena for the point of familiarity by which it could assure itself of the continuity of its “world” and feel orientated. In Kant’s example the point of familiarity is the object in the darkened room whose position he remembers and from which he is then able to reassemble the context of his everyday activity. For Heidegger, what is important is less the re-established context of everyday activity than the world in which Kant first remembers an object’s position and whose ontological explication he notwithstanding omits. Hoping to pass off the skeletal marriage of proprioception and a remembered object as the richness of the phenomenon of orientation, Kant swiftly passes over their common ground in world to the successful orientation within the unworlding of world in everyday activity.

If Heidegger stresses the subjectivity in Kant's account of orientation, it is not in order to suggest that orientation, for Kant, is solely the affair of the feeling for the difference between the two sides of one's body. The casualness with which Heidegger hears Kant introduce the object whose position he recalls is, for Heidegger, the casualness with which one might speak, not so much of a superfluity, as of something self-evident. It is this appearance of self-evidence and its uninterrogated ontological presuppositions that Heidegger seeks to address and that he can only address by abandoning the conventional definition of orientation as a familiarising of oneself with one's environment. Being-in-the-world, as the possibility of orientation and hence as the site of the distinction between the familiar and the unfamiliar, can never be the point of familiarity by which the subject orientates itself and recovers itself for the immersion in everyday activity. For the sake of an understanding of its primary orientation as Being-in-the-world, Dasein has therefore to resist the seductions of the familiar and the comfort of feeling itself oriented within the context of its everyday activity.

This resistance, in turn, cannot without contradiction become a voluntary activity. It cannot become the enduring task that develops into the point of familiarity by which Dasein orientates itself within as well as against its world. Dasein must lose itself even in its disorientation, since only then can it hope to find itself in world as such. In the definitive example of orientation, the sun — on the basis of whose familiarity one is able to align the horizon with the points of the compass and continue on one's way — does not illuminate Being-in-the-world, but rather contributes to its obfuscation under the reassertion of everyday activity. By fixing his attention on the world that is tacitly presupposed in Kant's account of orientation, Heidegger does not, as it were, fill out a lacuna in Kant's account, because this account is adequate to its definition of secondary, i.e. everyday orientation only so long as Being-in-the-world is not thematized.

Heidegger's reading of "What is Orientation in Thinking?" does not succeed as an immanent critique of Kant. Heidegger freely admits that Kant had set himself a quite different task: Kant's interest in treating orientation was to show that every orientation by the familiar involved a subjective principle. In several respects, Kant's brief essay of 1786 constitutes a digest of the earlier Critique of Pure Reason. By means of his opening description of orientation in a darkened room Kant arrives at the subjective principle that is none other than the a priori intuition of space, and from this reprise of "The Transcendental Aesthetic" he then proceeds to a comparable discipline of theology. Orientation is, for Kant, the occasion to demonstrate, once again, the complementarity of intuition and concept and thereby to reprove the exclusive conceptualism of dogmatic metaphysics. Given the task that he had set himself, Kant has to extract from the phenomenon of orientation, not world as such, but that which is at once non-conceptual and a priori. Already in one of his pre-critical writings Kant had adduced the difference between the two sides of one's body as an example of a non-conceptual difference. And in the feeling of this difference, on account of the role it plays in every orientation, Kant willingly notes the a priori and thereafter turns to his critique of Mendelssohn.

As it is not his aim in "What is Orientation in Thinking?" to confound empiricism, let alone nationalism, Kant makes very little of exposing a transcendental moment in orientation. On his way to his encounter with dogmatic metaphysics, Kant thus calls into question with what right any phenomenon could be taken for that which is most familiar. Whenever it orients itself, whenever it feels that it is "at home", the Kantian subject has recourse to the feeling of the difference between left and right. This a priori feeling is more familiar than any of the various objects that must combine with it in the process of orientation. The Kantian subject is thus more "at home" in the a priori than it is among any given phenomena. Its well-known cosmopolitanism is the consequence of this demotion of the familiarity of phenomena. What is decisive for the Kantian subject's being-at-home is the application of the subjective principle, rather than the spatial immediacy of a Heimat. For Kant, the object whose position he remembers in the darkened room is not superfluous to orientation, but its familiarity is certainly subordinate to the familiarity of the constant differentiation between the two sides of his body.

Heidegger does not protest this subordination. In his reading of “What is Orientation in Thinking?”, Heidegger does not rescue the object in the darkened room. He does not seek to reverse the demotion of its familiarity and to enter an empiricist’s claim for the originarity of phenomena. What Heidegger protests is the disregard of the world that first renders familiar both the object and the subjective principle of the difference between left and right.¹⁸ It is Being-in-the-world that is, for Heidegger, the true a priori of orientation, just as it is Being-in-the-world that is experienced by Dasein, however, as disorientation when it is torn from its immersion in the everyday.

The true a priori, as that which is ontologically closest to Dasein, is the true Heimat. It is the originary in its most exacting sense and that by which every definition of Heimat must therefore be governed. But this Heimat, which is closest to Dasein, is not for that reason familiar to Dasein. Indeed, the very originarity of Being-in-the-world excludes it from becoming familiar. As it is not an intraworldly being, it cannot give itself up in the light of presence to be apprehended in a stable set of properties. The repetition in which the familiarity of the familiar is experienced, because the being at issue is re-recognised, is defined by the vulgar understanding of temporality. The atomistic “now”, which is only able to give way to its successor because it presupposes the ecstases of originary temporality, affords the necessary distinctness of the entity that is to be repeated and, in being repeated, recognised as familiar. In contrast to the stable entities of recognition, Being-in-the-world is transcendent and thus unrepeatable. It is neither the feeling for the difference between right and left nor an object whose position one remembers, because it is the sense of these individual components by which Kant reconstructs the phenomenon of orientation. Being-in-the-world can never become familiar. It is also, one might say, the strangeness at the heart of what is taken to be familiar. When one's surroundings are experienced as unsettling and alien, this is for Heidegger not a merely subjective disturbance in the apprehension of things as they are. What a thing is said to be in its everyday acceptance, how an object can appear familiar within a darkened room, presupposes the suppression of the inscrutability of Being-in-the-world. Heidegger's account of orientation effectively concludes with the statement that orientation, in Kant's sense, is impossible: the more meticulously one studies one's surroundings and endeavours to grasp them as they are so as thereby to become oriented, the more one is overwhelmed by the strangeness of Being-in-the-world.

Kant's account of orientation thus undergoes in Heidegger's reading a suggestively oriental destruction. The stability of the points of reference by which Kant orients himself is undermined in Heidegger by the intrusion of that which refuses to stabilise. In its resistance to reification and to its incorporation in a frame of reference, Being-in-the-world stands under the prohibition on images. Kant orients himself in spite of Judaea. With a northerner's perception of the sun's position at noon Kant writes:

To orientate oneself, in the proper sense of the word, means to use a given direction — and we divide the horizon into four of these — in order to find the others, and in particular that of sunrise. If I see the sun in the sky and know that it is now midday, I know how to find south, west, north, and east. For this purpose, however, I must necessarily be able to feel a difference within my own subject, namely that between my right and left hands.¹⁹

Kant supplements the constancy of the Orient as the fixed point of orientation with the constancy of the subject. For Heidegger, however, it is not a matter of finding what is constant, since making sense of the subject, which in Kant's exposition makes sense of the sun, is the inconstancy of the transcendence of Being-in-the-world. In his destruction of the traditional account of orientation, Heidegger does not come upon the fixed point whose stability is grounded in classical ontology's understanding of Being as presence. Heidegger's Orient does not turn out to be Greek.

For Heidegger, orientation is a being-at-home in Being-in-the-world. As Dasein is essentially Being-in-the-world, Dasein is always at home. But Dasein misunderstands the character of its Heimat. In confusing its Heimat with a given intraworldly being or a subjective principle, Dasein convinces itself that it is "at home" in what is nonetheless alien to its Being. It is only in Being as such that Dasein can be at home and it is at home to the extent that it is disconcerted.

By comparison, Descartes arguably retains the conventional definition of the security of Heimat when he grounds modern metaphysics on the terra firma that is subjectivity. In his lectures on the history of philosophy, Hegel discusses the transition from the philosophy of the Middle Ages to the philosophy that, with Descartes, knows itself as self-consciousness and is at home:

Philosophy in its own proper soil separates itself entirely from the philosophizing theology, in accordance with its principle, and places it on quite another side. Here, we may say, we are at home, and like the mariner after a long voyage in a tempestuous sea, we may now hail the sight of land; with Descartes the culture of modern times, the thought of modern philosophy, really begins to appear, after a long and tedious journey on the way which has led so far.²⁰

The Cartesian doubt that questions everything except the certainty of itself as doubt is that alienation from the thingly by which the subject is forced to the acknowledgement that, henceforth, it is only with itself that it can feel at home. With the guarantee of this self-certainty of alienation, a knowledge of what is can again be attempted. But by retaining the conventional definition of the security of Heimat in the foundation of his metaphysics, Descartes conceals from himself the questionability of requiring certainty from a starting point. He begins from what is familiar and certain and employs its familiarity and certainty as the stable measure of beings. Kant, who inherits from Descartes the conviction of the desirability of certain foundations, is too ready to find a use for the constancy of the transcendental subject. The certainty with which the transcendental subject can be held to repeat its “I think” alongside every judgement and thereby provide the foundation for possible syntheses is not itself originary. The repetition of the transcendental subject’s “I think” is only conceivable within the discrete “nows” of derivative temporality: the certainty of the transcendental subject is its reification into that which is always only ever present-at-hand. Kant’s cosmopolitanism is a being-at-home everywhere because it finds itself everywhere as the presence of what is. But in being always only ever present-at-hand, the cosmopolitan subject is shut out from the originary as such and is properly homeless. The true Heimat, judged by the originary of originary temporality, cannot be present-at-hand.

Strictly speaking, then, Heidegger does not reassert in the phenomenon of orientation the object that Kant pushes to the background in concentrating on the subject. Heidegger dwells on the object whose position Kant remembers not for its own sake but for the sake of its foundation in Being-in-the-world. Heidegger pulls the object back to the foreground in discussions of orientation in order to interrupt the process by which the Kantian subject finds itself at home in subjectivity, rather than — more originarily — in

Being-in-the-world. He recalls Kant's dependence on the object in orientation and disputes the plausibility of the subject's absolute withdrawal into itself. With the reassertion of the object in orientation, Heidegger recovers Being-in-the-world from its suppression in the founding of the metaphysics of subjectivity. Contending that the subjectivity of the subject precedes any relation to an object and suppressing Dasein's Being-in-the-world, Kant makes the a priori intuition of space the native element of the subject. In "The Transcendental Aesthetic" Kant argues of space:

Space is nothing but the form of all appearances of outer sense. It is the subjective condition of sensibility, under which alone outer intuition is possible for us. Since, then, the receptivity of the subject, its capacity to be affected by objects, must necessarily precede all intuitions of these objects, it can readily be understood how the form of all appearances can be given prior to all actual perceptions, and so exist in the mind a priori, and how, as a pure intuition, in which all objects must be determined, it can contain, prior to all experience, principles which determine the relations of these objects.²¹

Receptivity, which always remains receptivity in the face of the variety of the empirical intuitions received, becomes for Kant the independent form in which these intuitions are received. On the basis of the constancy of its reception the subject is situated in the ideality of the pure a priori intuition here named space. That Kant does not ask whether a receptivity in abstraction from every reception is meaningful is of course explained, albeit not justified, by his desire to salvage the integrity of geometrical space from Hume's critique. As the form of all possible appearances, space is present in all objects and its homogeneity lies in the definitional invulnerability with which it continues to be affectivity through every instance of affection. What is at stake in Heidegger's reading of "What is Orientation in Thinking?" is not a restoration of the heterogeneity of the space of pre-Kantian empiricism. The "heterogeneity" of Being-in-the-world, which Heidegger sets against homogeneous space, is not a set of sundry objects but rather the transcendence of Dasein.

It is in this sense that Heidegger's remark on geometrical space in History of the Concept of Time needs to be understood:

What is homogeneous is the pure space of metrics, of geometry. For these have destroyed the peculiar structure of aroundness only in order to arrive at the possibility of the discoverability of homogeneous space.²²

The peculiar structure of aroundness is misapprehended if it is resolved into the objects in one's vicinity. Aroundness, for Heidegger, precedes the discovery of homogeneous space and it cannot therefore be grasped in a cobbling together of homogeneous space and objects that are only incidentally defined by their proximity. Unless the proximity of the objects is understood as what is essential — and that is to understand them no longer in terms of the topological indifference of the objectivity of the object and thus no longer, strictly, as "objects" — then the presence in which the objectivity of the object stands and in which space is discovered as homogeneous remains determinative. The structure of aroundness is the sitedness of each respective Dasein in the transcendence of its world. Destroying this structure first establishes the objectivity of the object. The finitude of the peculiar structure of aroundness is thus not overcome in order to arrive at the possibility of the discoverability of homogeneous space, since it is in a retreat from this structure that homogeneous space first opens itself up. The infinity of this space is the consequence of its retraction into the uniformity of presence. The peculiar structure of aroundness is always beyond the reach of the subject and, given the originarity of this structure, the subject cannot be held ever to be at home. It is only that which exceeds the subject, not numerically but ontologically, that can ever be at home. Only Dasein, in its transcendence of the presence by which the subject is defined, finds itself in the originarity of aroundness. It is a people, as authentic Being-with-one-another and not as an aggregate of territorially minded subjects, that dwells in a Heimat and, as Being-in-the-world, even is this Heimat. When Kant raises his famous question “What is man?” in the introduction to his lectures on logic, and does so explicitly within the cosmopolitan concept of philosophy, it is without any consideration for the question of a people.²³ This question is in fact closed to Kant because in the consistency with which he expounded the understanding of Being as presence he could not hesitate between the abstract individual subject and the rediscovery of this subject everywhere: it is therefore not without a tacit reference to Kant’s transcendental subject that Heidegger in Being and Time analyses the Seinsweise of the “they”.

In the Contributions to Philosophy Heidegger summarises his objection to Kantian space:

What one otherwise and up to now has thought about space and time, which belong back into this origin of truth, is — as Aristotle for the first time worked out in the Physics — already a consequence of the previously established essence of beings as οὐσιᾶ and of truth as correctness and of all that which follows from that as “categories.” When Kant calls space and time “intuitions,” that is within this history only a weak attempt to rescue what is ownmost to space and time. But Kant had no access to the essential sway of space and time. In any case the orientation to “I” and “consciousness” and re-presentation mislays all the ins and outs.²⁴

Here Heidegger retreats from his earlier thesis in Kant and the Problem of Metaphysics regarding the union of originary temporality and the “I” of transcendental apperception. Kant’s attempt to rescue what is ownmost to space and time through their theorisation as a priori intuitions founders on subjectivity. Having set forth a distinction between intuition — as the domain of non-conceptual differences such as that between left and right — and concept, Kant does not carry this distinction to the point of a rupture with classical ontology. The repetition by which the subject is convinced of both the formal independence of its receptivity and the purity of space does not ultimately differ from the repetition in which the concept manifests its authority over a plurality of appearances: in both intuition and concept the previously established essence of beings as οὐσιον dictates repetition as a repetition of presence. For Kant, regardless of his asseverations to the contrary, space is thus a priori inasmuch as it is substantial. Even though he rejects in “The Paralogisms of Pure Reason” the application of the categories of nature to the Being of the “I think” of the transcendental ego, the very unity of the transcendental ego evinces the continuity of classical ontology. With the substantiality of a space that is everywhere the same the Heimlichkeit and originary strangeness of Being-in-the-world has, however, little to do. Betraying the promise of the distinction between concept and intuition, Kant expels the unrepeatable from a priori space: within the publicness of Kantian space Dasein lacks the means to do anything but keep the whereabouts of its singular Heimat to itself.

Does the fact that Heidegger criticises the cosmopolitanism of homogeneous space suffice to make him an advocate of the National Socialist Heimat? Heidegger’s notion of Being-in-the-world is clearly not the theoretical justification of the smugness and xenophobia of the sanctioned but politically unrepresentative cultural products of the regime. More important, with Hitler’s Lebensraum Being-in-the-world is similarly incompatible. Indeed, alongside the muddled reading of Darwinian theories on which the notion of Lebensraum rests, there can be discerned in Hitler's conception a cosmopolitan indifference to place.²⁵ Hitler's biologically conceived Volk faces the task of conquering for itself a territory from whose resources it will then be able to sustain itself: the exigencies of the struggle for survival do not permit any sentimental predilection for one's native soil. In the notion of Lebensraum space remains thought within the understanding of Being as presence, because territory takes on the stability and thingliness of that which is recognised in presence. With its plans for the exploitation of resources and its absolute subjectivity, the biologically conceived Volk bears an unmistakable resemblance to the entrepreneur of high capitalism. Under the guise of the animal, Nazi Germany remained thus in the thrall of the model of nineteenth-century England and the spirit of emulation for which it reproached the Gründerjahre, in the end, went unchecked. National Socialism was imperialistic not because it sought a Heimat, but rather because, in its subjectivity, it had no proper comprehension of Heimat. In the abstractness with which it stood over against its environment, it had already come to the possibility of an expandable and domitable territory that is the inspiration of imperialism.

If Heidegger, in his 1934-5 lecture course on Hölderlin, speaks of the fatherland as Being itself, it is, therefore, in order to initiate a discourse that, despite every appearance, had not yet begun. Heidegger's nationalism, as an interrogation of the originary, understands "das Deutsche" through the question of Being. Susanne Ziegler sees in such an interpretation Heidegger's clear divergence from the metaphysical nationalism of National Socialism:

What "das Deutsche" ultimately and genuinely means for Heidegger is the chance outlined in Hölderlin's poetry of coming to a foundational experience of Being different to that upon which the entire Western tradition rests.²⁶

Ziegler speaks of the chance of the other beginning, and it is this possibility — preserved under and in spite of National Socialism as deferral — that defines the fatherland for Heidegger with a grandeur beside which the hubris of the regime appears as petty-mindedness.

That which is German is not self-evident. For Heidegger, the otherness of the other foundational reception of Being that is “das Deutsche” is only to be fully revealed through the encounter with the Greeks. In this he heeds Hölderlin’s exhortation to such an encounter. But although Heidegger follows Hölderlin, he interprets him in an elaboration, rather than a rejection of his own earlier thinking. Meditations on Heimat and “das Deutsche” can be discovered in Heidegger’s writings before his engagement with Hölderlin. To address these notions with reference to Hölderlin is, however, to address them with reference to the Judeo-Christian legacy that Heidegger, as a philosopher, believed he had to disown and silence. In Hölderlin this legacy, which has nothing to do with the continuity of a tradition, stands more clearly, if still agonistically, out in the open.

Repeatedly in his commentaries on Hölderlin, Heidegger devotes his attentions to the letter to Casimir Ulrich Böhlendorff of 4 December, 1801. It is here, in the course of offering Böhlendorff a response to his drama, Fernando oder die Kunstweihe, that, in Heidegger’s exegesis, Hölderlin sets forth the question of what it is to be German. The passage reads:

We learn nothing with more difficulty than to freely use the national. And, I believe that it is precisely the clarity of the presentation that is so natural to us as is for the Greeks the fire from heaven. For exactly that reason they will have to be surpassed in beautiful passion — which you have also preserved for yourself — rather than in that Homeric presence of mind and talent for presentation.

It sounds paradoxical. Yet I argue it once again and leave it for your examination and use: in the progress of education the truly national will become the ever less attractive. Hence the Greeks are less master of the sacred pathos, because to them it was inborn, whereas they excel in their talent for presentation, beginning with Homer, because this exceptional man was sufficiently sensitive to conquer the Western Junonian sobriety for his Apollonian empire and thus to veritably appropriate what is foreign.

With us it is the reverse. Hence it is also so dangerous to deduce the rules of art for oneself exclusively from Greek excellence. I have labored long over this and know by now that, with the exception of what must be the highest for the Greeks and for us — namely, the living relationship and destiny — we must not share anything identical with them.

Yet what is familiar must be learned as well as what is alien. This is why the Greeks are so indispensable for us. It is only that we will not follow them in our own, national [spirit] since, as I said, the free use of what is one's own is the most difficult.²⁷

It is worthy of note that nowhere in this passage does Hölderlin use the word “German” (“deutsch”). For Heidegger, it is, however, tacit that “the national” (“das Nationelle”) of which Hölderlin writes is the nationality of the German. Thus the lecture course Hölderlin's Hymn "The Ister" reprises the letter to Böhlendorff in the following manner:

What the Germans lack, what must therefore first come to be encountered by them as that which is foreign to them, is the "fire from the heavens." It is this that the Germans must learn to experience so as to be struck by the fire and thereby to be impelled toward the correct appropriation of their own gift for presentation. Otherwise the Germans will remain exposed to the danger and the weakness of suppressing every fire on account of the rashness of their capabilities, and of pursuing for its own sake the ability to grasp and to delimit, and even of taking their delimiting and instituting to be the fire itself. It is therefore the pure self-experiencing of his own poetizing when Hölderlin says of the Germans, as distinct from the Greeks: "whereas the main tendency in the manners of representation in our time (i.e. the time of the Germans) is the ability to hit on something, to have destiny [Geschik], since the lack of fate [das Schiksaallose], the δυσμορον, is our weakness."²⁸

Heidegger's parenthesis, "(i.e. the time of the Germans)", that is to secure the interpretation betrays, rather, its peremptoriness. How is it straightforward that the time that Hölderlin names as "our time" in its difference from the time of the Greeks in the "Remarks on 'Antigone'" is "the time of the Germans"? By what authority can Heidegger assert that Hölderlin's use of the first person plural here limits itself to an evocation of the community of the Germans? Yet, conceivably, Heidegger's parenthesis is neither an elucidation nor a stopgap whereby a presupposed rift between Hölderlin's text and a general comprehensibility is sealed. The expression, "the time of the Germans", is, if anything, more obscure than Hölderlin's "our time". It is Hölderlin who elucidates rather than which Heidegger intends by "the time of the Germans". And indeed, according to Heidegger, this is how it should be. In the lecture course Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein", Heidegger writes of Hölderlin:

He is the poet of the Germans. But Klopstock and Herder, Goethe and Schiller, Novalis and Kleist, Eichendorff and Mörike, Stefan George and Rilke are German poets as well, belonging likewise to the Germans. Yet we do not mean it in that sense. "Poet of the Germans" not as subjective genitive, but rather as objective genitive: the poet who first poetizes the Germans. But have not the others also, and in their way, said and sung the German essence? To be sure, — and yet Hölderlin is in the superlative sense the poet, i.e. founder of German Being, because he has projected the latter the furthest, i.e. cast it out and ahead into the furthest future.²⁹

The sense of Hölderlin's "our time" is consequently not so much to be elucidated as enforced: his employment of the first person plural decides, for Heidegger, the German essence. When Hölderlin, in the letter to Böhlendorff, speaks of the West and Heidegger hears only of the Germans, there is thus a double aggression. It is not merely that all the peoples of the West have been subsumed under the rubric "German" — the Germans themselves, in their historical and geographical contingency, have disappeared before the arrival of this other Germany: *we, the non-Greeks ...*³⁰

Clearly the precise nature of the negation in this formula is not to be grasped in a bare allusion to dialectics. It is not enough to say that the Greeks and the Germans stand in a negative relation to one another. The identity of the Germans does not remain as a residuum once the stable, self-referring identity of the Greeks has been subtracted, because the Greeks, in the sobriety of their gift for depiction, are to all appearances the most Western and thus the most German of peoples. The essence of the West is to be encountered, if it is to be encountered at all, in the alien — Hölderlin would say, oriental — territory of Greek art. In what sense, then, can the Germans be more German than the Greeks, when every appearance suggests that it is the Greeks who are the Germans? Given that Hölderlin writes that what is one's own must be learnt just as much as that which is strange, the two principles by which Hölderlin defines Western and Greek art — namely, clarity of depiction and holy pathos — do not differentiate the Greek and Western peoples. The differentiation becomes, rather, a future task:

I [...] know by now that, with the exception of what must be the highest for the Greeks and for us — namely, the living relationship and destiny — we must not share anything with them.

Hölderlin's first person plural, and hence Heidegger's Germans, are the people who are not permitted to be Greek — we, the Germans, must not share anything with them. What alone distinguishes the Germans is the imperative under which they stand.

In the essay "The Perspective from which We Have to Look at Antiquity", Hölderlin explicitly presents this imperative as the necessity of an insurrection against antiquity:

We dream of education, piety, p.p. and have none whatsoever; it is appropriated — we dream of originality and autonomy; we believe to be saying all kinds of new things and, still, all this is reaction, as it were, a mild revenge against the slavery with which we have behaved toward antiquity. There seems to be indeed hardly any other choice than to be oppressed by what has been appropriated and by what is positive, or, with violent effort, to oppose as a living force everything learnt, given, positive. What seems most problematic here is that antiquity appears altogether opposed to our primordial drive which is bent on forming the unformed, to perfect the primordial-natural so that man, who is born for art, will naturally take to what is raw, uneducated, childlike rather than to a formed material where there has already been pre-formed [what] one wishes to form.³¹

The despotism of Greece is not to be eluded through the choice of the material to be fashioned into a work of art because the very fashioning of material is Greek. Under such conditions, the human being who is born for art prefers the crude and shapeless, which in the absence of any articulation and formation never emerges as such into the light of day. The artist who is not Greek creates nothing. Such an artist lives under a prohibition of images and can thus never be at home in the ontic.

Once Greece has been defined, however summarily with respect to the art of other cultures, as the essence of the positive, a confrontation with Greece and Greece alone becomes indispensable, if the task of a radical differentiation is to be adequately formulated. Greece, as the essence of the positive, becomes the origin of every manifest culture: in November 1802, in the second of his two extant letters to Böhlendorff, Hölderlin can thus speak of his journey through the south of France as an encounter with Greece.³² Heidegger similarly absolutizes Greece. As the site of the determination of the essence of the planetary culture of the West, Greece is recalled by everything that is. It is the first beginning, which must be exhaustively thought through to its Un-thought merely in anticipation of the other beginning. The scope of Greece, as the scope of classical ontology, is not to be underestimated.

In one of the first studies dedicated to Hölderlin, let alone to his relations to antiquity, Wilhelm Michel perceives an “occidental turn” (abendländische Wendung) in the late poetry and interprets it as an ultimately unavailing defence against the heavenly fire of the Greeks.³³ But what is the West towards which Hölderlin is said to have turned? The earlier poetry is not lacking in Swabian place names just as the later is not lacking in Greek — that which Hölderlin opposes to the Greeks is not a matter of cartography.³⁴ The imperative voiced in the letter to Böhlendorff, as Hölderlin’s recent realisation of the limits imposed on his labours in the sphere of Greek art, does not and cannot issue in a poetics for the establishment of a specifically Western poetry. The imperative is left to sound by itself. The negation that announces itself at first as a failing and as a deficiency (the inability to equal the Greeks) is to be reclaimed as an affirmative divergence in another art, a non-art. Hölderlin, as the founder of German Being, founds a people in this poverty and necessity. For Heidegger, it is this very poverty and necessity that constitute the affirmative divergence of Hölderlin’s poetry:

Hölderlin puts into poetry the very essence of poetry — but not in the sense of a timelessly valid concept. This essence of poetry belongs to a definite time. But not in such a way that it merely conforms to that time as some time already existing. Rather, by providing anew the essence of poetry, Hölderlin first determines a new time. It is the time of the gods that have fled and of the god who is coming. It is the time of need because it stands in a double lack and a double not: in the no-longer of the gods who have fled and in the not-yet of the god who is coming.³⁵

Hölderlin’s art is the negation of art and, in the age of “a double not” and its crisis, it is thus the essence of poetry. Hölderlin’s art is the art of the gods who have fled and of the god that is coming because it is the most mimetic, the most rigorously deferring. It is too poor in “reality” to be nihilistic. As the art that is the furthest removed from “reality”, it is the closest to the non-nihilistic essence of a nihilistic age. It is the art of the inconspicuous.

Listing in his commentary on the hymn “Der Rhein” three reasons for choosing Hölderlin as his subject, Heidegger contends that this art has to be known in its inconspicuousness:

1. Hölderlin is the poet of the poet and of poetry. 2. In accordance with that, Hölderlin is the poet of the Germans. 3. Because Hölderlin is this concealed and difficult thing [dieses Verborgene und Schwere], poet of the poet as poet of the Germans, he has not yet become the power in the history of our people. Because he has not yet become this, he has to become it. To contribute to this is “politics” in the highest and authentic sense, so much so that whoever achieves something here has no need to talk about the “political”.³⁶

Inasmuch as they neglect a confrontation with the concealment and difficulty of Hölderlin, the Germans are oblivious of their essence and, that is to say, of their poverty and their politicality. Strictly speaking, therefore, the Germans as Germans do not yet exist and their fatherland cannot yet be thought. The poverty that Hölderlin intimates to Böhlendorff as the possession specific to the West remains to be grasped as such and thus truly possessed. This poverty is the caesura of the decision. The counterfeit witticism on the emptiness and hence indecisiveness of Heidegger’s thinking of decision that circulated among the auditors of his lectures in the late 1920s (“I am resolved, but to what I don’t know”) belittles Heidegger’s attempt to grasp the poverty of the caesura.

The crisis that resolves itself in deciding in favour of one of its options weakens in its resolution, because it has done with decision. As Jean-Luc Nancy writes in The Birth to Presence, it is the undecidability composing the decision that has to decide itself and decide in favour of itself.³⁷ For Heidegger, it is in the ontic poverty of resoluteness that Dasein properly gathers itself into the wealth that is its distance from the reification holding sway in the thought of humanity since the inauguration of classical ontology. The people that comes to be within the decision would not be Greek, and not because of any extant and thus decidable and mutually exclusive attributes.

Even before the explicit concern with Hölderlin's poetry, Heidegger, in the 1934 lecture course Logic as the Question Concerning the Essence of Language, approaches the question of what it is to be German by way of the existential of resoluteness. Having rejected as unduly metaphysical all expositions of the essence of a people based on notions of the body, the soul and the spirit, Heidegger proceeds:

It will be a matter of answering the question concerning the essence of the people in the same manner in which we have posed questions at all — thus in the direction of the question to which the answer “We are the people” was given: in the direction of the question “Who...?” Hence here as well we cannot ask: “What is a people?”, in order to arrive at a universally binding definition, but rather: “Who is this people that we ourselves are?”³⁸

The people never yields up its essence to questions after its qualities. The question “What...?” always overrides its transcendence. The reservations Heidegger harbours in Being and Time towards explications of individual Dasein are here carried over to the first person plural. Heidegger does not ask after a general essence of the people. Instead, he enquires into the nature of the particular people evoked by the first person plural.

Who constitutes the “we” in this passage? The “people” composed of Heidegger and the racially monitored student body of 1934? To be sure, in this lecture course Heidegger’s fascination with the new regime frequently appears undisguised. At one point, he suggests a museum is the fitting resting place for the aeroplane that had recently conveyed Hitler to his meeting in Venice with Mussolini.³⁹ The suspicion cannot therefore be dismissed that Heidegger is promoting a National Socialist conception of the Volk. And yet it would likewise be suspect to assert that nothing besides a National Socialist conception of the people is at work in these lectures. Heidegger, who in 1934 discourses upon the people of the decision and commends service within the SA, retains, in the later lectures on Hölderlin, the same definition of the people and yet employs it polemically against the existing populism. It is as though National Socialism had revealed itself as a feeble makeshift for Hölderlin.

If there is disillusionment already in Logic as the Question Concerning the Essence of Language, it is because the revolution promised by National Socialism has not eventuated. A year after the seizure of power, Heidegger announces in these lectures: “We are then as beings not those who we are.”⁴⁰ Human Dasein has not overcome its ontic cast. The first person plural is here at odds with itself: it answers to a “What ...?” when it is a “Who ... ?” that befits it. The German Volk shies away from the revolution that is to challenge the hegemony of reification, because it shies away from the decision and the rediscovery of itself in originary temporality: “In resoluteness (Entschlossenheit), the human being is directed, rather, into the happening of the future.”⁴¹ It lies in the nature of the revolution that Heidegger envisioned to be, not a moment in time, but an opening up of time. National Socialism will and must retreat in favour of Hölderlin. In its concentration on the extant attributes of a biological conception of the people, the movement was less open to the affirmative undecidability of the crisis by which Heidegger understands the future, and hence it was unable to think the people in the transcendence proper to Dasein.

The National Socialist orthodoxy that appears to announce itself in the selection of the problem of the people as matter for a lecture course is already scarcely audible in the following passage:

With the transformation of the question “What are we?” into the question “Who are we?”, it is not the interrogative pronoun alone that is changed. The whole sense of the enquiry is different, not only the “we” now accords with decision, but the Being of the question as well. Hence the second question of our enquiry: “What does decision mean here?” It must be raised because otherwise the answer “We are the people” remains incomprehensible.⁴²

The interrogative pronoun “who” expresses an understanding of Being different to that expressed by the interrogative pronoun “what”. To ask “Who...?” is to ask after existence in its irreducibility to the real predicates investigated by the question “What...?”. To ask “Who is this people that we ourselves are?” is to refuse the biological determinations proffered by National Socialism, just as it is to ask after the sense of Being forgotten by classical ontology. The German people that is to decide itself in National Socialism, but that ultimately cannot decide itself there is later called upon to hear itself in the first person plural of Hölderlin. It is the Volk whose mission is to be the people of Being. Its highest care is not the defence of the Lebensraum of the Aryan “type”. Its fatherland, and thus its highest care, is Being.

The essence of Heidegger's Volk is its mission. The Volk must learn that which is its own. That a given people should be confronted with its essence as with something alien is a paradox from which Hölderlin does not shrink and upon which he insists in the first letter to Böhlendorff. It is the same paradox that Freud in 1919 and Heidegger in 1927 will discuss as "the uncanny". Since the passage in question in Being and Time reads implicitly as a critique of the Freudian position it nonetheless in several aspects resembles, it is perhaps worthwhile to place Freud's text openly beside Heidegger's. Doing so will also enable us to give closer attention to Heidegger's notion of the ownmost (das Eigene). That which is ownmost to Dasein, that which is its essence as an exception to classical ontology, is that which it is the mission of the Volk to understand.

Meticulously determining the domain of "the uncanny" (das Unheimliche), Freud begins his text of that title:

The German word 'unheimlich' is obviously the opposite of 'heimlich' ['homely'], 'heimisch' ['native'] — the opposite of what is familiar; and we are tempted to conclude that what is 'uncanny' is frightening precisely because it is not known and familiar. Naturally not everything that is new and unfamiliar is frightening, however; the relation is not capable of inversion. We can only say that what is novel can easily become frightening and uncanny; some new things are frightening but not by any means all. Something has to be added to what is novel and unfamiliar in order to make it uncanny.⁴³

Having urged that what is not the one is not necessarily the other, Freud then queries whether the opposites themselves are exclusive. After quoting Jacob and Wilhelm

Grimm on the connotations of “heimlich” as that which is disguised and perilous, private and hence mysterious, he continues:

Thus heimlich is a word the meaning of which develops in the direction of ambivalence, until it finally coincides with its opposite, unheimlich.

Unheimlich is in some way or other a sub-species of heimlich.⁴⁴

Freud thereupon allows a usage of the word “uncanny” to illuminate this relation:

It often happens that neurotic men declare that they feel there is something uncanny about the female genital organs. This unheimlich place, however, is the entrance to the former Heim [home] of all human beings, to the place where each one of us lived once upon a time and in the beginning.

[...] In this case too, then, the unheimlich is what was once heimisch, familiar; the prefix ‘un’ [‘un’] is the token of repression.⁴⁵

The origin has become something alien as a consequence of repression.

§40 of Being and Time will speak similarly of the uncanny as the origin that has become alien and disquieting, but there the agent of repression is not so much Oedipus as classical ontology. In the exposition of Angst (Macquarrie and Robinson’s “anxiety”), Heidegger describes the uncanny:

Anxiety pulls Dasein back from its falling-away emergence in the ‘world’. Everyday familiarity collapses. Dasein is isolated, but isolated as Being-in-the world. Being-in enters into the existential ‘mode’ of the “not-at-home”. Nothing else is meant by our talk about ‘uncanniness’.⁴⁶

The world from which anxiety withdraws Dasein and for which Heidegger employs ironicizing quotation marks is the worldliness of chatter and curiosity. Dasein is thrown back upon itself in the uncanny and, in being thrown back upon itself, it is bereft of its familiarity with its environment. And yet it is world, now without quotation marks, that suddenly emerges from under the instrumentalisation by which Dasein falls away from itself in falling towards the cosmopolitan realm of its inauthenticity. The world that emerges is Dasein's Being-in-the-world even as Dasein suffers on account of its intense strangeness: "That in the face of which one has anxiety [das Wovor der Angst] is Being-in-the-world as such."⁴⁷ Dasein abruptly finds itself both within the world and not at home. Heidegger stresses: "From an existential-ontological point of view, the 'not-at-home' must be conceived as the more primordial phenomenon."⁴⁸ In the being-outside-of-itself of anxiety, Dasein experiences the truth of its originary transcendence.

Elaborating on this more originary phenomenon as it manifests itself in anxiety, Heidegger writes:

That in the face of which one is anxious is completely indefinite. Not only does this indefiniteness leave factically undecided which entity within-the-world is threatening us, but it also tells us that entities within-the-world are not 'relevant' at all. Nothing which is ready-to-hand or present-at-hand within the world functions as that in the face of which anxiety is anxious.⁴⁹

Through anxiety the hegemony of the ontic is challenged. Something else, something that exists beyond reification and that is thus "nothing", makes itself felt.

Like Freud, Heidegger permits himself an elucidatory example:

Anxiety can arise in the most innocuous Situations. Nor does it have any need for darkness, in which it is commonly easier for one to feel uncanny. In the dark there is emphatically ‘nothing’ to see, though the very world itself is still ‘there’, and ‘there’ more obtrusively.⁵⁰

The night is not nothing, but in the dark Dasein no longer sees itself surrounded by the objects of its everyday existence. It becomes disoriented, and inasmuch as it sets about orientating itself, it is still disoriented. Orientation, as the experience of the uncanniness of Being-in-the-world, becomes an issue for Dasein. Although it otherwise neglects the uncanniness of Being-in-the-world, in its dread before nothingness Dasein is unable to reorient itself in its everyday environment by disorienting itself in its understanding of its own Being. Strictly speaking, Dasein never reorients itself in the everyday — it is only ever already reoriented in the everyday. Orientation as such, because it brings into play Dasein’s Being-in-the-world, is always a disorientation. Dasein is no longer and not yet at home in the everyday, and it cannot make itself at home. Orientation has become a matter of urgency that works both for and against the inauthentic immersion of Dasein in its environment. No longer confronted with beings, Dasein finds itself in the uncanny before the Nothing. It exists authentically in orientation and the uncanniness that it encounters in its vicinity is its own Being-in-the-world. In anxiety, Dasein experiences the origin that is its being not at home in the ‘world’.

The proper homeland of Dasein is its disorientation and not any object to which its genesis could be attributed. Heimat, which is defined by originarity, acquires, with Heidegger’s exposition of the “not-at-home” as the more primordial phenomenon, a sense at odds with its conventional signification. Heidegger’s Heimat is proximal to the extent that it is uncanny. It is uncannily familiar, but not because it recalls something that momentarily cannot be specified. What is at once familiar and unsettling in the “not-at-home” is Dasein’s own Being. Heidegger does not follow Freud in providing an ontic answer to anxiety. The homeland of Dasein’s originarity pushes itself to the fore in anxiety by its proximity to the being that Dasein itself is: it is that which is nearest in an essential sense. This nearness, in its metaphysical unthinkability, is nowhere:

That which threatens cannot bring itself close from a definite direction within what is close by; it is already ‘there’, and yet nowhere; it is so close that it is oppressive and stifles one’s breath, and yet it is nowhere.⁵¹

In anxiety a “space” opens up between Dasein and the objects of its immediate environment. Anxiety comes not from anything that is close by, but from the “space” that, as Being-in-the-world, is the truth of Dasein’s engagement with its environment.

In “The Origin of the Work of Art” Heidegger again addresses the uncanny nature of the proximal: “The familiar is ultimately not familiar [geheuer]; it is monstrous [ungeheuer].”⁵² The becoming-monstrous of the familiar is its becoming-world. The homeland is always, and by definition, monstrous. As an essential possibility of the everyday, Heimat is not threatened but threatening. Angst is the mode of dwelling in the fatherland.⁵³ Can it be said then that for Heidegger, in some sense, it was the victims of the National Socialist terror still living uncertainly within the fatherland who were its proper inhabitants? In dread the originarity that is definitive of any notion of Heimat is experienced in its most radical cast.

Heidegger differs from Freud through a complicity with the uncanny. He refuses any explanation of the phenomenon whereby the rupture it effects in the everyday’s character of self-evidence might be made good through its reification. For Heidegger, the uncanny does not admit of resolution into an object. That Freud’s maternal body has been removed from the scene leads Irigaray to criticise Heidegger for perpetuating repression, “the reduction to nothing of that whence, matter-flesh, he proceeds”⁵⁴. But in what manner could repression not be perpetuated? Certainly Heidegger’s theorisation of Angst, to the extent that it interprets it as a mode of authentic Dasein, prizes the return of the repressed in its unavowable shape as “...” and thus maintains repression. And yet, in naming this “...” as the maternal body, Irigaray has recourse to an object, and hence to the recognizability instituted by metaphysics, in order to repress the challenge to the hegemony of the ontic that Heidegger seeks to hear in the silence of the uncanny.⁵⁵

Although Heidegger’s text is later than Freud’s, it says less because it wishes to think the uncanny as such. A decipherment of the uncanny, a treatment that solves its “riddle” clarifies only by obscuring the essence of the phenomenon. As the uncanny ceases to be uncanny once it has been explained and the explanation accepted, Freud’s explanation of the uncanny is entailed by a curative practice dedicating itself to the preservation of Dasein in its reification: Dasein is to be safeguarded in its domesticity among beings. Heidegger does not propose an “explanation” of the uncanny. In naming the fatherland as Being and in discussing anxiety as the experience of the originarity of Being-in-the-world, he does not place the fatherland in simple rivalry with Freud’s maternal body. The fatherland that is defined as Being, and thus by inference as Nothing, cannot be encountered within metaphysics as an object. Its repression cannot be overturned as it cannot stand in the light of presence as a distinct entity. The fatherland is too near to acquire substance and, for that reason, it can neither be defended nor extended.

In his commentary on Hölderlin’s poem “Heimkunft”, Heidegger thus writes:

The nearness that now prevails lets what is near be near, and yet at the same time lets it remain what is sought, and thus not near. We usually understand nearness as the smallest possible measurement of the distance between two places. Now, on the contrary, the essence of nearness appears to be that it brings near that which is near, yet keeping it at a distance. This nearness to the origin is a mystery [Geheimnis].⁵⁶

Nearness to the origin is essentially a secret (Geheimnis) because there cannot come a time in which it is divulged. The secretiveness of this nearness derives from the reserve with which the origin stands towards the light of presence. The origin that is not a secret, that exhibits itself in the public spectacle of a nationalistic uprising is never originary in Heidegger's sense. What is originary in the National Socialist Heimat is neither the Blut und Boden of the Aryan "type" nor the Lebensraum of German monopoly capitalism — what is originary in this Heimat is the dread experienced by the victims of this nationalistic uprising. The fatherland was the secret (Geheimnis) that the victims of National Socialism could not but keep to themselves.

It is thus with an idiosyncratic patriotism that Heidegger in Being and Time is on the alert for uprisings of the uncanny: "This uncanniness pursues Dasein constantly, and is a threat to its everyday lostness in the 'they', though not explicitly."⁵⁷ Dasein is shadowed by the experience of its own originarity, of the Heimat that is its Being-in-the-world. Uncanniness constantly threatens to recover Dasein from the worldless cosmopolitanism of the "they". When anxiety overtakes Dasein, it disorients it, disrupting the impoverished frame of reference by which Dasein orients itself in the way of Being of the "they". In the grip of anxiety, Dasein is no longer and not yet able to differentiate between its left and right sides and is thus unable to orient itself in the flattened world of Kantian cosmopolitanism. And orienting itself in the more primordial phenomenon of the "not-at-home", Dasein does not come to itself as the pure ego of Hegelian negativity.⁵⁸ It remains a being-outside-of-itself in the essential "not-at-home" of its Heimat. The home of Dasein eludes it as a stable possession and must elude it in order to remain the Nothing.⁵⁹ Dasein is born from nothingness in the sense that any other derivation would amount to its reification, just as it lives in nothingness as the uncanniness of its orientation in Being-in-the-world.

World, revealing itself in the Nothing, does not reveal itself. Even in the overwhelming experience of the uncanny, it continues to be a secret (Geheimnis). Dasein is able to say neither where it comes from nor where it is without reifying the Nothing. The home of Dasein is a secret because it is too private (heimlich) to ecstatic temporality for it to assume the cast of a repeatable entity. To put it differently, it is the untransmittable that, for Heidegger, constitutes the Heimat of Dasein, since transmission is the substance of the “they”, of the everyone that is everywhere. The strangeness of the Heimat is the impenetrable idiocy of time. Heidegger’s provincialism, notwithstanding its conventionality and occasional kitschiness, never lies far removed from the question of an understanding of originary temporality. Heimat, for Heidegger, is defined by the unrepeatability of the originary. The following passage on dialect from “Language and Homeland” thus needs to be read for its polemic against the understanding of language as the vehicle for the transmission of information:

The essence of language has its roots in dialect. If dialect is the mother’s language, the homeliness of the home, the homeland has its roots in it as well. Dialect is not only the mother’s language but, at the same time and still more so, the mother of language. Yet at the present hour as we heed what has just been said, I refer to the world-historical hour of our age, the inherited and traditional relations between language, mother tongue, dialect and homeland are already out of joint. Humanity appears to be losing the language fatefully allotted to it in each age, becoming in this sense speechless, although never in human memory has the globe been so uninterruptedly encircled by chatter. Humanity appears to be becoming homeless, so that the pronouncement holds good that Nietzsche in 1884 delivered to the future in a poem with the title “Ohne Heimat”:

The ravens shriek
And in whirring flight head towards the city:
— soon it will snow,
Woe to him who does not have a homeland.⁶⁰

Dialect, and with it language as a whole, retreats before universal exchange and its necessary deracination from the world founded by language. The superiority of a dialect is that it does not erase its world, that it knows how to keep secrets. A dialect is, as it were, a secret to the highest degree because it can never be divulged: it has no other content apart from its secretiveness. A dialect says the incomprehensibility of world. For Heidegger, a universal language is anathema:

Language in the singular does not exist. To put this more cautiously: language in the sense of a universally comprehensible and uniquely binding world-language does not yet exist, even though there are many indications that it is readying itself for a dominance that only to a small degree rests on human planning and intrigues.⁶¹

What a dialect has to say is less important than the manner in which it says it, in which it does not say it. The content of an utterance in dialect is its point of weakness regarding a universally comprehensible language, since it is the content that admits of transmission and that is consequently the promise of a global language. The dialect in its secrecy stands opposed to reification and in place of an extra-lingual object it harbours Heimat as the originary idiocy of Dasein. Dialect is dialect only if it is uncanny, if, by failing to transmit something intact into another dialect, discourse or language, it thereby communicates the Nothing. In this failure that is, properly speaking, its merit, dialect discloses itself as originary: it is the language of originary temporality. The essential provincialism of Dasein rests on its utmost exposure to nothingness. In not reaching beyond its world, dialect reaches beyond the limits of classical ontology.

That there might be something other than simple bigotry in Heidegger's provincialism is never conceded by Adorno. The latter, in his essay devoted to Hölderlin, "Parataxis", writes:

Hardly anywhere did Hölderlin prove his posthumous champion more wrong than in his relationship to what is foreign. Hölderlin's relationship to it is a constant irritation for Heidegger. For Heidegger, the love of a foreign woman requires an apology. She is "the one who at the same time makes us think about our native land."⁶²

Heidegger's provincialism here becomes a disavowal of the exotic. But is such an interpretation the only one possible? Does the exotic suggest that which is native merely as its opposite? In order to accuse Heidegger of a misinterpretation of the letter to Böhlendorff, Adorno passes over the interplay between the exotic and the national, between Aufgegebenes and Mitgegebenes in Hölderlin's and Heidegger's texts and arrives at the conclusion: "The exiled Hölderlin, who said in the same letter to Böhlendorff that he wished himself away in Tahiti, is made into a trustworthy German living abroad."⁶³

On the basis of the published archival material it can be argued that Heidegger's nationalism is not as straightforward as Adorno pretends. In his 1944 lecture notes, Introduction to Philosophy: Poetry and Thinking, Heidegger again comments upon Nietzsche's poem "Ohne Heimat" (or, as it is given in the critical edition, "Abschied") and its counterpart, "Antwort". The second poem, clarifying the first, reads:

God have mercy!

He thinks I was longing

For German warmth,

For the stifling joys of German domesticity!

My friend, that which here

Hampers me and holds me back is your understanding,

Compassion for you!

Compassion for German wrong-headedness!⁶⁴

For neither Nietzsche nor Heidegger is the homeland an object of conventional nostalgia. As Heidegger writes in his commentary — and as Hölderlin writes to Böhlendorff — it is something that must be won:

In the complementary poems "Ohne Heimat" and "Antwort", there speaks this doubly directed compassion that suffers back and forth between the incapacity of the former homeland and the heights of the future homeland.⁶⁵

The incapacity of Bismarck's and of Hitler's Germany follows from its homelessness. This helplessness is belied neither by military victories nor by increases in production, because such "successes" reveal themselves precisely as a flight from nothingness to the realm of reification and calculation. Flying from nothingness, imperialism flies from the question of world, from the question of Being-in-the-world that can be raised only in a challenge to the hegemony of the ontic and that alone contests homelessness.

Hölderlin's poetry, by contrast, stands fast within the uncanniness that he expounds as the tragic caesura. In a letter to Erhart Kästner, Heidegger writes:

What does Hölderlin's poetry say? Its word is: the Holy. It speaks of the flight of the gods. It says that the fled gods spare us. Until we are capable and of a mind to dwell in their vicinity. This place is that which is unique to the homeland.⁶⁶

What characterizes the homeland is the nearness of the gods. The absence of the gods is equivalent to the absence of the homeland. The gods who have fled before onto-theology have borne the homeland with them as the nothingness that is the Un-thought of metaphysics: what metaphysics cannot think constitutes the specificity of the homeland. It is the homeland as such that metaphysics cannot think in its rush towards the universal, in its pursuit of the reification that is the precondition of exchange.

Standing in the caesura between the "no-longer" and the "not-yet" of the gods, Hölderlin says the homeland that is missing. He does not think so much the challenge to the hegemony of the ontic as the absence of this challenge. On account of the absence of this challenge, it cannot be said that we have any understanding as yet either of nothingness or of Heimat. Hölderlin, more than any other poet, is the founder of German Being because he experiences, more than any other, the national as a question against rather than of metaphysics. Hölderlin founds German Being as a question that is nonetheless still unheard. That is to say, he founds the possibility of a people that would be, in the true sense, the German Volk.

Insofar as Hölderlin can find only the possibility of a people, it can be said that, in one respect, there has never been a people. A fragment preserved in the Homburg folio notebook, and quoted earlier, suggests that the Greeks were not for themselves a people:

do you think

It will proceed

Along the course of old? Namely they wanted to found

A realm of art. But thereby

The national was neglected

By them and pitifully

Greece, the fairest of all, was destroyed.

Now presumably matters

Stand otherwise.

In wanting to found a realm of art the Greeks neglected, not the nation, but the national and thereby initiated their decline. Hölderlin's choice of the substantive "das Vaterländische" (here translated as "the national") works against any interpretation that here the Greeks are being reproached with impracticality. Certainly "the national" is distinguished from the realm of art, yet "the national" cannot be taken to refer to the defences of a country, to the maintenance of its economy and public order. These matters are to varying degrees of concern in every nation and, in themselves, do not make the nation national. In their neglect of the national (as distinct from the nation), the Greeks neglected that which was specific to them. It is by means of this neglect that they fell into decline. It was the beautiful that they put in place of the national. As a result, Greek decline is not subsequent to the age of outstanding achievements in Greek art: the Greeks created works of art precisely in falling away from themselves as a people.⁶⁷ The inauthenticity of Greece is its beauty and it is this beauty, rather than any foreign invasion, that signals and consummates its decline. As the most beautiful, Greece sentenced itself to decline because it neglected the specificity and privacy of world in its unrepresentability for the sake of the universality and presence of art. The world of the Greeks disappears in its surrender to the recognizability of the public sphere. Greece manifested itself as the realm of art and thereby fell away from the Nothing of its world. That which was specific, and thus necessarily private, to the Greeks could not be made present in the work of art without becoming an item of exchange in the traffic of peoples. Art reveals too much — it tears too much from the native earth.⁶⁸ Having transformed themselves into the people of art, the Greeks no longer possessed a homeland and, in complicity with their unacknowledged diaspora, they even forgot what it was not to be homeless.

Peter Szondi emphasizes the extremism with reference to Winckelmann in Hölderlin's attitude towards Greece. Discussing the essay "The Perspective from which We Have to Look at Antiquity", Szondi writes:

The essay is Hölderlin's early attempt to lodge a protest, however inadequate, against the thesis that imitation of the ancients is the only way for us to become great, indeed inimitable were that possible. Neither in the name of the modern nor against antiquity, nor for that matter on the basis of the Herderian view that to every epoch there must belong an art proper to it is the protest being raised. Instead, the protest directs itself against the principle of imitation as such, and it does so in the name of that which in bare reproduction must relinquish its life: the vital force.⁶⁹

The living force does not reproduce itself, and in not repeating itself, in not dividing itself up into the distinct entities of derivative temporality, it holds itself back from reification and thus from the visibility of the work of art.⁷⁰ Its originality is its invisibility. Its obstinate specificity is akin to non-existence.

In the Aesthetics, Hegel, from his point of view, has to denounce the non-productive artist:

For what is supreme and most excellent is not, as may be supposed, the inexpressible — for if so the poet would be still far deeper than his work discloses. On the contrary, his works are the best part and the truth of the artist; what he is [in his works], that he is; but what remains buried in his heart, that is he not.⁷¹

For Hegel, production is existence. Greece exists in having produced itself. For Hölderlin, a people that does not wish to produce, that does not want to be recognised, which is to say, that does want to be recognised as Greek, is the people that finds itself, as it were, in not existing. Not neglecting its specificity, not destroying itself through art this people is an invisible people, a people that is missing — an uncanny people.

Hölderlin, in the letter to Böhlendorff, does not speak of national arts. Art, for Hölderlin, is essentially a-national. The distinct gifts of the Greeks and the Hesperians do not hinder them from approaching a common art; instead, they establish the differing tasks by whose execution the goal is to be attained. Art draws the peoples together.

Hölderlin's essay "On the Operations of the Poetic Spirit" rejects one-sided definitions of the work of art in favour of their co-ordination:

[...] not merely primordial simplicity of the heart and of life where man feels himself uninhibitedly as in a restricted infinity, nor merely attained simplicity of the spirit where that very sensation which is purified to a pure [and] formal mood receives the entire infinity of life, (and is ideal), but which is instead spirit reanimated by the infinite life, not chance, not ideal, but is accomplished work and creation [...]⁷²

One of the most deeply Classical aspects of Hölderlin's poetry is this emphasis on reconciliation. The bridal feasts shared by gods and humans at the centre of many of the hymns depict, at the very least, the celebration of that peace among the nations which is promised by art.

And yet, in the "Remarks on 'Oedipus'", the bridal feast becomes the monstrous violence at the heart of tragedy.⁷³ Here reconciliation loses its innocence but remains art's dominant imperative. Hölderlin, notwithstanding his increasing sense of the magnitude of the task of reconciliation, is unable to conceive of an art that does not aspire to reconciliation, and he thus figures within eighteenth-century aesthetics as its impossibility. The notion of the beautiful that, in Kant's Critique of Judgement, aligns itself, in part, with a universal accord of the respective judgements and that, in Schiller's "On the Aesthetic Education of Man", is defined by the reconciliation of sense and intellect receives perhaps its most extraordinary form in Hölderlin's Hyperion. There the εν διαφερον εαυτο of Heraclitus is interpreted in terms of beauty, since the beautiful has become the community of beings as a whole.⁷⁴ It is not that Hölderlin (and with him the eighteenth century) does not question whether art's concern is with the beautiful. He does — it is for the sake of the beautiful that art first assumes its importance.

Greece, as the most beautiful, cannot but neglect the national since, as the most beautiful, it is the site of reconciliation and thus also the most cosmopolitan. Hölderlin writes in the fragment from the Homburg folio notebook quoted earlier:

Now presumably matters
Stand otherwise.

The Greek neglect of the national is no longer appropriate. Something other than art is required, because the unity effected in the beautiful has been revealed as pernicious. Greece, the most beautiful, falls into ruin. That which is now required as other than art is required on the grounds of that which in it is not beautiful. This negative quality is not ugliness, but the irreconcilable, since the beauty of a work of art is its harmoniousness. And this harmoniousness, as the decline of Greece demonstrates, was never more than ostensible. Art reconciles only by suppressing the intractable.

Hölderlin confesses to Böhlendorff that the study of Greek art has instilled in him a desire for self-assertion:

I have labored long over this and know by now that, with the exception of what must be the highest for the Greeks and for us — namely, the living relationship and destiny — we must not share anything identical with them.

“We” must differ from the Greeks, so that the living mediation and destiny, shared with them as the highest, might not lack that resistance from which the vitality of mediation and destiny issues. The difference, as Hölderlin's letter to Böhlendorff makes clear, is not to be found in the realm of art where the inhabitants of Greece and of Hesperia converge, if by separate paths. Hölderlin is not able to say where the difference would lie and it is this inability that maintains the force of the imperative. The visible failure of Greek art is precisely its visibility, the ease with which it occupies the public sphere and abandons the secrecy of the intimate and the originary: the imperative to differ from the Greeks is the call of the uncanny.

Hölderlin asks of himself the impossible. Witnessing the fall of Greece through art, he nonetheless does not renounce poetry. What Hölderlin asks of himself is a differentiation from the Greeks that does not depart from their realm. Poetry is to retain the concreteness of the reified and yet it is to heed the uncanny of the national. The beauty of such a poetry is to lie in its reconciliation: it would, in effect, be the poetry of the ontological difference, reconciling beings and Being without suppression. Being, which announces itself in the uncanny as the "nothingness" of world, would here be heard even in the reification by which it has otherwise concealed itself. Such a poetry, in which the work of art's question against metaphysics would no longer be misinterpreted, is as it were commanded by the age:

Now presumably matters
Stand otherwise.

The national, as the originarity that is forgotten in reification, no longer allows itself to be neglected. Although why that should be so, is not apparent from these verses.

If there is a neglect that Hölderlin admits and endeavours to rectify in his later poetry, it is a neglect of Christianity. Certainly a poet will seem more national in a Christian country if his poetry addresses Christian themes, but nationality and

Christianity are to be thought in a more demanding sense in Hölderlin's poetry.⁷⁵ In the lecture course on the poem "Andenken", Heidegger suggests that the nationality and Christianity of the later poetry receive their sense only in the elaboration of the question of Greece:

The new relationship to Greece is not a turning away, but rather a more essential turning towards Greece and a pressing for a more originary confrontation, without of course seeking in Greece the origin and ground of the proper [Grund des Eigenen].⁷⁶

It is in the quest for this origin and ground of the proper that nationality and Christianity open up in their abyssal character as the Un-thought of Greece. This search for the origin is, for Hölderlin, a poetic search.

Hölderlin's own experience is that he cannot be a Christian poet: poetry is in some way inimical to Christianity. "An die Madonna" contains the confession:

And many a song which to
The Highest, the Father, I once was Disposed to sing, was lost
To me, devoured by sadness.⁷⁷

"Der Einzige", with its wish to bring together Christ and the gods of Greece, is more expansive on the nature of this melancholy:

And now my soul
Is full of sadness as though

You Heavenly yourselves excitedly cried
 That if I serve one I
 Must lack the other.⁷⁸

The reconciliation for which Hölderlin sought has been withheld. He admits to Christ:

And yet a shame forbids me
 To associate with you
 The worldly men.⁷⁹

The gods of Greece are here presented as profane men among whose number Christ is never to be counted. The poem's final lines read therefore as an objection:

The poets, and those no less who
 Are spiritual, must be worldly.⁸⁰

Poetry, as that which fundamentally concerns itself with the beautiful, cannot submit to a failure of the reconciliation of the urbane and the spiritual. Christ can fill Hölderlin as a poet only with sadness. This sadness turns in the second version of "Der Einzige" to rage:

For since evil spirit
 Has taken possession of happy antiquity, unendingly Long now one power has prevailed, hostile to song, without resonance,
 That perishes in masses, the violence of the mind.⁸¹

Antiquity has given way to a monotheism that, in its hostility to the urbane, declares itself the enemy of song. It is intractable and therefore refuses the beautiful. The Christianity that is suggested by these lines is too ascetic to be representative either of the German churches of Hölderlin's day or of the churches as a whole. What this violently recalcitrant Christianity represents is, instead, the ultimate task of poetry as reconciliation. Hölderlin's rage cannot therefore permit itself to terminate in a rejection. As that which is intractable to reconciliation with the urbane, as that which cannot be sung, as that which stands apart from all that is, Christianity here discloses itself as a challenge to the hegemony of the ontic. Poetry can no longer continue in the Greek manner, since with the sounding of this challenge in the Christian revelation the beautiful is only attained through a reconciliation still more inclusive than that undertaken by the Greeks. The ontic can no longer pretend to constitute the domain of the beautiful. The poet who now accomplishes the reconciliation of the beautiful will be the poet of poetry and, as such, this poet will be, according to Heidegger in Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein", the poet of the Germans.

For Hegel, the Christian revelation likewise enacts within the classical world a rupture. Both Hegel and Hölderlin acknowledge the adverse conditions henceforth facing the production of a work of art. Yet whereas Hegel asserts that philosophy alone is able to achieve the reconciliation by which art was once defined, because in the modern age only philosophy can encompass the revealed negativity of Spirit, Hölderlin seeks a poetry that does not neglect the national because it heeds its challenge to the hegemony of the ontic. Hegel and Hölderlin are thus at odds in their explanations of the decline of Greece. For Hegel, it was rather the Greeks' absolute immersion in the national to the exclusion of the dawning negativity that was responsible for their downfall:

Just as external and actual appearance was essential for the Greek spiritual art-form, so too the absolute spiritual destiny of man was accomplished in the phenomenal world as a real actuality [the state] with the substance and universality of which the individual demanded to be in harmony. This supreme end in Greece was the life of the state, the body of the citizens, and their ethical life and living patriotism. Beyond this interest there was none higher or truer.⁸²

In Hegel's account, the exhibition of autonomous subjectivity in the person of Socrates places an intolerable strain on the reconciling powers within the Greek πολις. The infinite and de-nationalised negativity of the self-reflective subject opens a fissure in the concrete life of Greek politics and Greek art. As the transcendental, this de-nationalised subject becomes the deterritorialised territory of the Christian faith as it is formulated in and as Hegel's philosophy. The rupture that Hölderlin and later Heidegger explain in terms of the national appears, in Hegel's eyes, as the awakening of Spirit: the encounter with the Nothing becomes the liberation of the subject from all other beings so that it might finally encounter itself.

Hölderlin does not see that the task in the post-classical age is the reconciliation that would encompass even the universal of absolute subjectivity. The fact that, for Hölderlin, even the Greeks neglected the national indicates that it is toward the specific that art must now turn in order to bring about the reconciliation by which he understands the beautiful. Art has always been too one-sidedly ontic to be beautiful. It has always been too much under the sway of the Dingbegriffe of classical ontology. Even as mimesis, it has always been too "present" to interrupt the particular's subsumption under the universal. The evil spirit in the hymn "Der Einzige" is the enemy of song and its unitarity cannot be equated with the universal. Its singleness denotes its jealousy, not its universality. Hölderlin's Christianity, with its Judaic cast, confronts art with its limitations from below, setting against art's universality, not the sublation of the concrete notion, but the recalcitrance and undecidability of the private.

As the enemy of song, the evil spirit that seized hold of antiquity harbours the possibility of thinking the national. More than any other province of the Empire, Judaea staged the failure of the cosmopolitanism of the Roman Peace. Neither the destruction of the Temple under Titus nor the enforced exile of the Jews under Hadrian sufficed to extinguish Jewish particularism, and even the later ordination of the Jewish people as bankers and intellectuals, as agents of circulation⁸³ did not dispel the myth of their secretiveness. In many respects, Judaea was seen to constitute an exorbitant revolt against the commensurable. Christianity, inventing itself as the absolute secret, spread from Judaea to affront the classical world with a pure and internal barbarism. Its secret was simply its rejection of glory. When Jesus rejects the public realm in which the Pharisees performed their good deeds and preaches that the left hand should not know what the right hand is doing (Matt. 6: 3), he privileges secretiveness over that which stands in the light of presence. Christianity was an uprising of the concealed with respect also to language. Although the glossolalia of the Gnostics and early Christians occupied the space of language, it yet offered nothing that on account of the universality of its content could be translated. It said the Nothing — not the negativity of the Hegelian ego, but the nothingness of the a-signifying. In glossolalia, the harmony of meaning and material, by which Hegel defines classical art, is not disrupted by the preponderant meaning of the Christian Logos. Only within an anachronistically theological interpretation of the early Church is it possible to imagine that the disgust felt by the classical world for Christianity and for Judaism can be explained as a pagan reaction to monotheism. What horrified the classical world was more the secretiveness, the privileging of the private and idiosyncratic (in short, that which was, for the classical world, the idiotic) over the public, the transmittable, the comprehensible and commensurable. Sensitive to this aversion, Saint Paul cautioned in the First Letter to the Corinthians against speaking in tongues, voicing his apprehension that outsiders might hold believers in contempt as mad (1 Cor. 14: 23). Glossolalia is absolute dialect. In focussing his attention on dialect's inability to transmit information, Heidegger proposes an understanding of dialect reminiscent of the early Christian polemic against unconcealment.

Hölderlin's wish to be a Christian poet, expressed in "Der Einzige" and "An die Madonna", is flouted by Christianity's refusal to be reconciled with the light of presence in which the work of art stands. Hölderlin's wish is to be the poet of that which is unsayable within the limits of poetry laid down by the Greeks. Hölderlin's inability to be a national poet is his inability to be a Christian poet. It is the inability of poetry as such, rather than any inability peculiar to Hölderlin, because in both the national and the Christian, at least in Hölderlin's sense, poetry confronts that which is intractable to reification. For Hölderlin, the fatherland is essentially Christian. It is Hölderlin's absolute ambition as a poet, not Heimweh, that determines the national as an object of aspiration.⁸⁴ Hölderlin aspires to the fatherland because he wants more than has ever been wanted. In the lecture course Heraklit, Heidegger draws attention to this aspect of Hölderlin as it is embodied in the name and figure of the eponymous hero of his novel: "Υπεριον is the name of the one who goes further than the others, even to that which for 'rational human beings' always goes 'too far'."⁸⁵ For both Hölderlin as a poet and for Heidegger as a thinker, Greece is the point of departure — the fatherland lies elsewhere as its unfamiliar complement.

Yet in a fragment Hölderlin writes:

About the Highest I will not speak.

But, like the laurel, forbidden fruit
 Your country is, above all. To be tasted last
 By any man,⁸⁶

The national neglected by the Greeks is here for Hölderlin just as much forbidden fruit as the laurels that the Greeks did not neglect. Heidegger quotes this fragment at the beginning of his lectures Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein" and continues:

The Fatherland, our Fatherland Germania — forbidden to the utmost, withdrawn from the hurry of the everyday and the blare of commotion. The highest and thus the hardest, the last because fundamentally the first — the concealed origin. Thereby we have already said what our beginning with "Germania" does not mean. It is not a question of offering something amenable and useful for daily requirements, thereby securing testimonials for the lecture series so that the pernicious opinion could arise that we are wanting to provide Hölderlin with a cheap timeliness. We do not want to bring Hölderlin into accordance with our time, rather the very opposite: we want to bring ourselves, as well as those to come, under the poet's measure.⁸⁷

Heidegger does not want Hölderlin to appear timely in the winter semester of 1934-5. He does not want Hölderlin's patriotism to appear to anticipate National Socialism. That which makes Hölderlin seem untimely — the prohibition upon the fatherland — is, for Heidegger, not something that can be held against Hölderlin, since it is Heidegger's age that is out of step. The fatherland must be prohibited in order to remain the fatherland: in 1934-5 its time has not yet come. Hölderlin is, for Heidegger, the poet of the no-longer of the Greeks and the not-yet of the fatherland. He is the poet of the task of the reconciliation of the cosmopolitan with the national, but he is not the poet of the reconciliation itself. For Hölderlin, both the laurels of the public realm and the fatherland of the secret are forbidden, since he is the poet for whom the necessity of their reconciliation is not to be forgotten through an absorption in the one to the neglect of the other. Hölderlin's poetry is therefore not strictly beautiful, even though it records the promise of the greatest beauty. It is neither national nor transnational. Instead, it promises a nationalism more deeply rooted than any chauvinism and a reconciliation more inclusive than any cosmopolitanism.

The impossibility at the heart of Hölderlin's poetry is its position within the cleft between the ontic and the ontological, between Greece and Judaea. This cleft constitutes the impossibility of the West. It is the "and" in the title of Shestov's Athens and Jerusalem, which Shestov himself refused to countenance, preferring a mutually exclusive and global disjunction⁸⁸ (Shestov does not want to know anything of that which Derrida calls the cleft's hypocrisy⁸⁹). For Hölderlin, as a poet, there is no choice but to remain within the cleft and to attempt the reconciliation of the thingly and the iconoclastic. If it is ever to be beautiful, poetry has to disorient itself within its Greek positivity, to open within itself a distance from the ontic. It must set out for that Hesperia which as the undecidable other of Greece is the Dis-orient, the uncanny orientation of Dasein within the Nothing and the Un-thought of classical ontology. Hesperia, or that which Heidegger names as the fatherland, is Being. Inasmuch as Greece could thus never have been a fatherland even for the Greeks, Klopstock's question becomes senseless:

Is Achaea the Teutons' Fatherland?⁹⁰

V The Geschlecht of the Poem

From its cursory employment in Being and Time, the word “Volk” flares up in the thirties and early forties to a dominance in Heidegger’s thinking that is not afterwards sustained. An exception to the apparent ban imposed on the word “Volk” — that is also not an exception — lies in the polysemy of “Geschlecht”. In the 1952 essay on Trakl, “Language in the Poem”, Heidegger addresses the polysemy of “Geschlecht” as an occasion for the question of Being. Has the German Volk been relieved of its ontological mission? Given that, for Heidegger, the Volk was nothing other than this mission, the later text cannot be interpreted as relieving the Volk of its mission or as replacing it with the Geschlecht. That which in 1952 is named “Geschlecht” is better understood as a clarification of that which had previously been named “Volk”. The clarification lies in an emphasis — characteristic of late Heidegger — on the role of difference in the question of Being.

This polysemy of “Geschlecht”, according to Heidegger, is not external to the individual significations of the word:

Our language names the human essence shaped from a single blow (Schlag) and misshapen (verschlagen) in this blow the “Geschlecht”. The word signifies the human species (Menschengeschlecht) in the sense of humanity as well as Geschlechter in the plural sense of tribes, houses and families, all of these stamped again in the twoness of the Geschlechter.¹

A Geschlecht can never be integral since it is, by definition, stamped with a twoness.²

The people that, for Heidegger in 1952, survives in “Geschlecht” survives only in being given up to division:

With what has this Geschlecht been struck, i.e. cursed? Curse in Greek is πληγή, our word “Schlag” (blow). The curse of the decaying Geschlecht consists therein, that this old Geschlecht has been struck apart into the discord of Geschlechter. Out of discord each Geschlecht strives into the unleashed uproar of the isolated and sheer wildness of wild game. Not twoness as such, but rather the discord is the curse. Out of the uproar of blind wildness it carries the Geschlecht into strife, where it is struck with untrammelled isolation. Thus cleft and shattered, the “decayed Geschlecht” can on its own no longer find its proper cast. The proper cast lies only with that Geschlecht whose twoness leaves discord behind and wanders ahead into the gentleness of a simple twofold, i.e. is strange and thus follows the stranger.³

The “decayed Geschlecht” does not find its proper cast in being made whole. The Geschlecht is cursed, not in being divided, but rather in the aggravation of its division to the point of discord. Falling upon a community as upon the other senses of Geschlecht, the proper cast of Geschlecht returns it to its essential, yet paradoxical solidarity in the loneliness of its members. Geschlecht cannot come to its twofold self within the narrow and paranoiacally regulated unity of National Socialism, because such a unity never encompasses Geschlecht in its fragmentary whole and thus merely testifies to discord. The Geschlecht finds its “proper” cast in the decay of a unity such as Hitler’s Volk.

As a letter from 1938 might be taken to suggest, National Socialism prompted in Heidegger an attachment to loneliness:

I believe that an age of loneliness must break over the world, if it is once more to draw breath for action that restores to things their essential force.⁴

Arguably the loneliness of which Heidegger is speaking is not the loneliness of the isolation that afflicts the Geschlecht in its open discord. The loneliness that appears when the Geschlecht is frozen into reactive and antagonistic determinations bears scant resemblance to the loneliness of the relation to the essential. Heidegger speaks of an age of loneliness that is to break over the entire world. Accordingly, he does not situate the loneliness of the relation to the essential in the idiosyncrasy of a numerical minority. The essential is itself the element of loneliness. In its originarity and hence its difference from the positive, the essential offers nothing against which a being could determine itself and re-compose itself. Once it has set out on the path to this other loneliness and the curativeness of the indeterminacy of the twofold, it is doubtful — as Trakl was well aware — that the Geschlecht can remain recognisably human. Heidegger's question of 1934, "Who is this people that we ourselves are?", has, if anything, become more questionable.

But what does it mean in any case to be human? Heidegger's essay on Trakl often recalls his earlier expositions. Yet that which elsewhere appears peremptory and conventional becomes unsettling in the text on Trakl. Heidegger sets himself the task of thinking through Trakl's notion of humanity: "The Geschlecht of humanity's 'decayed form' is what the poet calls the 'decaying' Geschlecht."⁵ Trakl's humanity decays as Geschlecht. If it is in the grips of decomposition, if it is not itself, it may then, Heidegger argues, be something else. After having for decades drawn a distinction between the animal and the human, Heidegger in 1952 problematizes the distinction with reference to Trakl's "blue deer":

Who is the blue deer to whom the poet calls out that it recollect the stranger? Is it an animal? To be sure. Is it only an animal? By no means. For it is said to recollect. Its face supposedly looks out for ... and looks to the stranger. The blue deer is an animal whose animality presumably does not lie in the bestial, but rather in that watchful recollection after which the poet calls. This animality is still distant and scarcely visible. The animality of the animal here in question thus oscillates in the indeterminate. It has not yet been brought into its essence. This animal, namely the one that thinks, animal rationale, humanity, remains, according to an expression of Nietzsche's, not yet firmly established.⁶

Heidegger is not anthropomorphizing Trakl's figures as though only the human were a fit matter for poetry. On the contrary, it is because the human has not yet become recognizable as a distinct entity that it cannot be absolutely distinguished from a blue deer. Heidegger continues:

The proposition does not mean in any way that humanity has not yet been factually "established". It has been only all too definitely. What is meant is that the animality of this animal has not yet been brought "home", into firmness, the ownness of its concealed essence. This determination has been the goal for which Western-European metaphysics has been struggling since Plato. Perhaps it struggles in vain.⁷

The animality of the animal that is the human being has not yet been understood. However recognisable the human being is said to be, it has not yet become recognisable as human. Whatever is passed off as human, out of impatience and short-sightedness, is simply an imposition:

The blue deer, where and when it essences (west), has left the previous essential form of humanity behind. Humanity, as it has been known up to now, decomposes insofar as it loses its essence (Wesen), i.e. decays (verwest).⁸

The blue deer is the essence of humanity. It emerges with the decay of that which has been understood as “humanity”. In decaying, humanity wrests apart artificial configurations of its essence. Decay undermines the rigidity and hence discord through which the Geschlecht finds itself cursed. It restores the Geschlecht to the gentleness of its double nature.

Decay is not a calamity that befalls the Geschlecht from outside, since it is the essence of the Geschlecht to decay. Fellini, for whom decay was likewise not a calamity, coined the word “procadence” in the conviction that the negative prefix “de” in “decadence” is misleading. In Trakl’s poetry, decay cannot be said to be an unequivocal object of lament. For all the evocations of decay in his work, it is only in the prose poem “Traum und Umnachtung”, with its wish that it be spring, that there is anything approaching an aversion. Otherwise Trakl — unlike Lorca, for instance, and the great body of satirical literature — foregoes contrasting and condemning decay with images of what might be taken for a prelapsarian humanity. In themselves, the representations of decay in Trakl’s poetry offer little by way of eulogy:

Decay glows in the green puddle.

(“Kleines Konzert”, v. 9)

Lepers who perhaps decay at night

Read the scattering signs of birdflight.

(“Traum des Bösen”, v. 13-14)

A herdsman decays on an old stone.

(“Im Dorf”, v. 2)

Soul sang death, the flesh’s green decay.

(“An einen Frühverstorbenen”, v. 11)

These verses do not express an opposition to decay. Given the impassivity with which they are described, the lepers and the herdsman seem not so much to be afflicted by decay as to have decay as their way of Being. These figures are at home in decay. And that is to say, inasmuch as they have not congealed into an inalterable form, they are human.

To be human, to be that for whose determination metaphysics struggles in vain, is to be nothing else but decaying. That the blue deer could be human is because it itself hesitates in its essence:

In the poetizing name “blue deer” Trakl calls that human essence whose countenance, whose countering glance, is seen by the night’s blueness in its thinking of the stranger’s steps and is thus illumined by the holy. The name “blue deer” names mortals who recollect the stranger and who would wander with him through the ownness of the human essence.⁹

The blue deer appears in the decay of humanity in response to the promise of the latter's essence. Appearing with the decay of every reification of humanity, the blue deer cannot appear with the factuality of something present-at-hand. The blue deer essentially hesitates, and thus hesitates in its appearance, because it wanders, and it wanders because it dies. The death that Heidegger elsewhere denies the animal¹⁰ is here granted the blue deer. The blue deer dies; it does not merely perish. By means of its essential finitude, it departs in search of that which is proper to the human and hence not present-at-hand. The blue deer, since it is mortal, decays and it is by decaying that it sets out on its quest for the non-positivity of the human. It embarks for what is most distant without having to move from its place.

The blue deer, because it is never itself, cannot die in the sense of being extinguished. Death changes its nature in Trakl, as Heidegger notes:

In the poem "Psalm" Trakl says:

The madman has died.

The next strophe says:

The stranger is buried.

In the "Siebengesang des Todes" he is called the "white stranger".

The last strophe of "Psalm" ends with the line:

In his grave the white magician plays with his snakes.

The deceased lives in his grave. He lives in his chamber, so quietly and lost in thought that he plays with his snakes. They can do nothing against him. They have not been strangled, but their evil has been transformed.¹¹

As a figure of decay, the white magician "lives" even in his grave. He lives by dying and not perishing. He continues to "live" by decaying.¹² As it is by decay that the strife of the individuated is mollified, the uproar of the determinate against the determinate yields in the grave to quiet play. For the white magician, his snakes cease to be evil. The curse of the Geschlecht, which had brought the snakes into open discord with him, has been lifted. In his decay, the white magician surrenders the ontic ground for his differentiation from the snakes. He dies away from the determinate towards the becoming of decay. He dies towards his snakes.

To be dead here, as Heidegger writes, is not to be no more:

The deceased is the madman. Is this a question of someone who is mentally ill? No. Madness (Wahnsinn) here does not mean a thinking (Sinnen) that imagines (wähnt) nonsense (Unsinniges). “Wahn” belongs to Old High German wana and means: “ohne” (“without”). The madman thinks, and he thinks even as no one else has yet thought. But he thus remains without the sense (Sinn) of others. He is of another sense. “Sinnan” signifies originally: to journey, to strive after, to strike out in a direction; the Indo-Germanic root “sent” and “set” means “way”. The one who has departed is the madman, because he is underway in another direction.¹³

The dead and the mad are both engaged in a pursuit of the essence of the human. That is to say, they have both turned away from every determination of humanity. Accordingly, it is among the dead and the mad that Being and Time finds its true readers. In their eyes, Dasein is compelled to stand forth from the anthropomorphisations and reifications concealing and debasing it.

Humanity is in decay. Decay is not a property of the human being, let alone a property that would be predated by every other property. On the contrary, decadence is the origin from which humanity falls away. Ceasing to be itself in acquiring its extant, and hence recognisable, attributes, the Geschlecht stands under the curse of no longer decaying.¹⁴ What Heidegger writes of decay in Trakl's poetry does not place it in opposition to the origin:

The language sings the song of the departed homecoming, which from the lateness of decay comes to rest in the earliness of the quieter, still un-been beginning.¹⁵

The lateness of decay converges with the earliness of the beginning that continues to "have been" (gewesen) because it is not past (vergangen) and extinguished as an earlier "now". Trakl's language sings the homecoming of decadence away from its misapprehended, negative nature into its truth as the originary. Decay is not to be overcome for the sake of a return to the origin. Instead, it is to be understood as the originary.

Heidegger, accordingly, does not ascribe to Trakl a motif of regeneration, as the following lines on the site of his work make clear:

The situality of the site [die Ortschaft des Ortes] that gathers Trakl's work into itself is the concealed essence of departedness, and is called "Evening Land", the Occident. This land is older, i.e. earlier and therefore more promising than the land conceived as Platonic-Christian, let alone as European.¹⁶

Platonism and Christianity constitute neither the site of Trakl's work nor its promise. For that matter, the Occident is not the site of Trakl's work. On the contrary, the Occident is the manner in which this work is situated at all. Its occidental site is a being vespertine rather than a geographical location, and it is decadent rather than regenerative. Precisely because it is decadent, the “Evening Land” is closer to the origin than the land conceived as Platonic-Christian. In its decay, it does not submit to the Platonic-Christian imperative of purification and thus does not set itself apart from the indeterminacy of finitude.

Trakl’s “Evening Land” would only be identifiable as the distinct geographical entity known as Europe if it submitted to the Platonic-Christian imperative. As the poet of the Occident, Trakl is the poet of the originary. As the poet of the originary promise of decay, he does not subscribe to any Platonic-Christian model of regeneration.¹⁷ That which does not decay, that which in its immutability informs the Platonic doctrine of ideas and the Christian doctrine of the soul, has always, in itself, fallen away from originary temporality. The immutability of the idea and the soul is proof, not so much of their dignity, as of their fallenness, since this immutability is grounded in the derivative understanding of temporality. The soul and the idea have their roots in presence.

In order to extricate Trakl from the vulgar concept of time, Heidegger opens his text with a violently expropriative reading of a line from the poem “Frühling der Seele” (v. 22):

The soul is strange to the earth.

By means of an examination of the etymology of “fremd” (“strange”), Heidegger refuses here a Christian interpretation of the soul:

But “fremd”, the Old High German “fram”, really means: forward to somewhere else, underway toward ..., onward to that which has been kept in store for it.¹⁸

The soul does not set itself apart from the earth. On the contrary, it is a moving-towards-the-earth. The soul is ecstatic because it is strange (fremd), and it therefore cannot be contained in the presence of Christian immortality.¹⁹ Trakl's soul is a being that has transcendence as its Being. It decays within the origin and it is as originary temporality, and hence as Dasein, that it decays.

The origin in Trakl is, for Heidegger, too originary to be metaphysical. It is the essence and homeland seen and thought only by the "madman":

Trakl's poetry sings the song of the soul, which, "strange to the earth", wanders the earth precisely as the quieter homeland of the homecoming Geschlecht.

Dreamy romanticism at the periphery of the technico-economic world of modern mass existence? Or — the clear knowledge of the "madman" who sees and thinks differently to the reporters of the topical who exhaust themselves in the recounting of whatever is contemporary, whose calculated future is only ever a prolongation of what is current, a future that is forever without the advent of a destiny that could ever concern humanity at the beginning of its essence?²⁰

Trakl's soul is strange to the earth and the origin, but the earth and the origin are, for that reason, not that which is familiar to the reporters of the topical. Heidegger is not attributing to Trakl's soul nostalgia for the lost Bodenständigkeit of the familiar. He is not appealing to the origin, to homecoming and to the homeland, in order to substantiate "at the periphery of the technico-economic world" some reactionary cult of the authenticity of the autonomous subject, as Thomas Bernhard suggests.²¹ It is not the petty bourgeois whom he opposes to the levelled existence of the modern world — but then nor is it, as he earlier stresses, the individual who alerts a symptomatology of mental disorders. Heidegger's "madman" is to be thought differently.

In the Contributions to Philosophy, Heidegger writes:

In the history of the truth of Being, Dasein is the essential incident [Zwischenfall], i.e. the intervention of that in-between [Zwischen] into which humanity must be deranged [ver-rückt] if it is ever again to be itself.²²

A human being does not so much become mad, as become human only in madness. That which now passes for human must hence be torn out of its determinations into the kairological interval that is the madness of Dasein in its essential ecstasy as originary temporality. The mad, following Heidegger in his etymology of "Wahnsinn", cannot be said to have embarked on a journey as though it were an activity undertaken by grammatical subjects. The mad are the journey in the same exhaustive and essential sense that Dasein is transcendent. Consequently, the origin is the destination of the journey — that toward which the "strange" soul is underway — insofar as it does not denote its conclusion, but rather its realisation as journey. The origin is to be understood as ecstatic, and thus as that which is properly human.

In 1952, "madness" thus comes to name the Un-thought of classical ontology and it is to the "mad" that Heidegger entrusts the question of Being. The essay on Trakl is, accordingly, a further attempt at that critical destruction of the metaphysical tradition undertaken since the 1920s. Where "The Self-Assertion of the German University" appealed to the Volk, "Language in the Poem" appeals to the mad and the dead. Precedents, therefore, suggest themselves for that which Heidegger seeks to think with the word “Wahnsinn”. Nonetheless, the consistency should not be exaggerated. What Heidegger earlier thinks with “transcendence” — the most obvious precursor for his etymology of “Wahnsinn” — must be rethought in the light of the later text and its reappraisal of the human. To do so is to ask after the linkages between Dasein, the Volk and the “mad”. It is to ask after the nature of the humanity of the being that raises the question of Being.

In the 1929-30 lecture course The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics, Heidegger offers his most extensive treatment of the difference between the animal and the human. Discussing the essential transcendence of Dasein, he writes:

For the being-there of Da-sein means being with others, precisely in the manner of Dasein, i.e., existing with others. The question concerning whether we human beings can transpose ourselves into other human beings does not ask anything, because it is not a possible question in the first place. It is a meaningless, indeed a nonsensical question because it is fundamentally redundant. [...] Being-with belongs to the essence of man's existence.²³

Dasein is always already transcendent. It is not possible for human beings to transpose themselves into other human beings, since to attribute transcendence to human beings as a possibility is to transform what is essential into what is optional.

In 1929-30, Heidegger distinguishes between the essential transposition of the human being, the limited transposability of the animal and the non-transposability of the inanimate object:

In contrast with the stone, the animal in any case does possess the possibility of transposability, but it does not allow the possibility of self-transposition in the sense in which this transpires between one human being and another. The animal both has something and does not have something, i.e., it is deprived of something. We express this by saying that the animal is poor in world and that it is fundamentally deprived of world.²⁴

Heidegger stresses that this last proposition is not to be understood as an additional property of the entity that has long been the domain of zoological enquiry:

Where does the proposition ‘the animal is poor in world’ come from? We can answer once again that it derives from zoology, since this is the science that deals with animals. But precisely because zoology deals with animals this proposition cannot be a result of zoological investigation: rather, it must be its presupposition. For this presupposition ultimately involves an antecedent determination of what belongs in general to the essence of the animal, that is, a delimitation of the field within which any positive investigation of animals must move.²⁵

Admittedly, Heidegger, who thereupon proceeds to talk of earthworms, moles and beetles, does not appear in The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics to wish to challenge the delimitations of the zoological.

Twenty years later, however, he calmly announces that a blue deer is human. Why? Because it thinks. At once it seems that he is invoking the arguments of The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics on the humanity of thinking. There, in §58, Heidegger writes:

Captivation is the condition of possibility for the fact that, in accordance with its essence, the animal behaves within an environment but never within a world.²⁶

What stands between the animal and a world is its captivation (Benommenheit). The nature of this captivation is not to be a captivation with something as such. Indeed “Benommenheit” could be more suitably (and more conventionally) translated by “daze” — the captivation that defines itself as an inability to be captivated by something as such. This captivated daze in which the animal lives prevents a world from emerging in the wealth of its articulations:

When we say that the lizard is lying on the rock, we ought to cross out the word ‘rock’ in order to indicate that whatever the lizard is lying on is certainly given in some way for the lizard, and yet is not known to the lizard as a rock. If we cross out the word we do not simply mean to imply that something else is in question here or is taken as something else. Rather we imply that whatever it is is not accessible to it as a being.²⁷

For late Heidegger, as is well known, it is the word “Being” that we ought to cross out, in order to indicate that Being as such is not accessible to us. Without access to the Being of beings and thus to what beings are as such, we are not free of the captivation in which the animal lives and perishes.

However, in 1929-30 the question of Being has not yet fully undermined the metaphysical distinction between the animal and the human. The lizard lies on a rock, but it does not lie knowingly on a rock. The rock as such withholds itself. The world refuses itself to the animal in general because it is accessible only to the being that knows. World becomes the prerogative of the human as the being that knows. Heidegger's choice of examples for discussion from the animal kingdom is seemingly dictated by a desire to avert suspicion from the definition of the human as the being that knows. The behaviour of bees while feeding conveniently furnishes Heidegger with a further example of a being that does not know:

[T]he bee recognizes that it cannot cope with all the honey present. It breaks off its driven activity because it recognizes the presence of too much honey for it. Yet, it has been observed that if its abdomen is carefully cut away while it is sucking, a bee will simply carry on regardless even while the honey runs out of the bee from behind. This shows conclusively that the bee by no means recognizes the presence of too much honey.²⁸

The honey as such does not appear for the bee. Not knowing what it is doing, the bee does not behave within a world.

But what does it mean for world to be tied to the knowability of what is? How can Heidegger's argument in The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics be brought into agreement with his demotion of epistemology in §13 of Being and Time? There he writes:

But a 'commercium' of the subject with a world does not get created for the first time by knowing, nor does it arise from some way in which the world acts upon a subject. Knowing is a mode of Dasein founded upon Being-in-the-world. Thus Being-in-the-world, as a basic state, must be Interpreted beforehand.²⁹

In Being and Time, Dasein knows because it is Being-in-the-world. In The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics, the bee is not Being-in-the-world because it does not know. There is an asymmetry between the two propositions. In Being and Time, Being-in-the-world is the presupposition of knowledge, whereas in The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics knowledge is the proof of Being-in-the-world. Yet in what way can knowledge be a proof of Being-in-the-world? Beings are knowable because they are cleared in the clearing of beings that is Being-in-the-world. Being-in-the-world is the knowability of what is and Dasein is the being that knows. But Dasein is not the being that knows in the sense that it is a subject that stands over against an object that it submits to scrutiny and about which it draws binding conclusions. Dasein is the being that knows because it is the clearing of beings. The bee is not the being that knows because it is a being that appears in the clearing of beings and is not the clearing itself. In Heidegger's example of the bee, the distinction between the animal and the human is illustrated, but not without ambiguity. The poverty of the bee's world lies in its difference from the knowability of what is, rather than in its nonsensical behaviour. In Heidegger's example this is ambiguous. Being-in-the-world appears to be susceptible to verification by a test of expediency. The bee without an abdomen expends energy in the consumption of honey that it cannot retain and thus behaves irrationally: it is not the animal rationale and it is not Being-in-the-world. Is this ambiguity, whereby the clearing of beings converges with the being with the most developed sense of the economical, simply a lapse on Heidegger's part?

If it is a lapse, it is one that is rectified in the essay on Trakl. In this later text Heidegger is much more careful to avoid encouraging readings that would anthropomorphise the clearing of beings. The greater caution alters the cast of the animal in Heidegger's thinking. The question that Derrida raises concerning the tenability of the distinction between the animal and the human in other texts by Heidegger is thus pre-empted by the essay on Trakl. In "Geschlecht II: Heidegger's Hand", Derrida examines the passage on the ape from What Is Called Thinking?, addressing his attention to the sentence, "Apes, too, have organs that can grasp, but they do not have hands"³⁰. Here Heidegger reserves the hand for the human and puts it a distance from any organic functionalism. Derrida, in response, advances a criticism of the differentiation proclaimed in this sentence and of the logic that informs its counterparts in other texts:

In its very content, this proposition marks the text's essential scene, marks it with a humanism that wanted certainly to be nonmetaphysical — Heidegger underscores this in the following paragraph — but with a humanism that, between a human Geschlecht one wants to withdraw from the biologicistic determination [...] and an animality one encloses in its organico-biologic programs, inscribes not some differences but an absolute oppositional limit.³¹

For Heidegger, the ape gives itself up to the organic analysis of biology, and as an animal it cannot do otherwise. With the human being it is another matter. Between the ape and the human being there are not merely differences in the plural and hence on the level of properties. There is a difference of essence. The humanism that Derrida attributes to Heidegger lies in this incommensurability. Derrida questions whether this absolute oppositional limit — by which the Geschlecht would be set rigidly in the discord between the human and the animal — does not collapse of itself. Derrida's question, however, presupposes the vulnerability of Heidegger's thinking to a Hegelian criticism. Is the incommensurability of the ape and the human really the matter of an absolute oppositional limit? Is the human defined as an extant being by the negativity of its opposition to the ape and thus contaminated by the ape in its very essence? For Heidegger, the incommensurability is not a difference between two essences distinct in the same way. The incommensurability is the difference between the clearing of beings, which is thus always already contaminated through its Being-with, and a being that appears in the clearing and allows its enclosure in "organico-biologic programs". And yet the clearing of beings has hands. This, however, is not an objection, since it is the clearing of beings that first "has" anything. Humanism would mark Heidegger's text only if it was denied that the clearing of beings has paws.

Heidegger's distinction between the human and the animal is better understood as an inclusion of the one in the other, than as a mutual exclusion. The animal that, in 1929-30, is seemingly not thought beyond its comprehension in the prevailing biology already anticipates the humanity of the blue deer. A sentence such as the following from the "Letter on 'Humanism'" has therefore to be read for what it does not say in the language of humanism:

Because plants and animals are lodged in their respective environments but are never placed freely in the clearing of Being which alone is "world," they lack language.³²

Plants and animals are never placed freely in the clearing of Being because they, unlike Dasein, are not the clearing of Being itself. Plants and animals do not speak, but then it is not one being among other beings that is here said to speak. The human is not, for Heidegger, a privileged being. Its difference from other beings as the being that speaks is the difference of Being from beings. Heidegger thus endows the “human” with a dignity surpassing that of any earlier humanism. But Heidegger’s apparent humanism is, properly speaking, an anti-humanism, inasmuch as it does not perpetuate the Christian myth of the human being as a being set apart from, and over, all other beings. This myth, which endorses the exploitation and manipulation of beings in the service of modern technicism, does not find expression in Heidegger. On the contrary, by identifying the human with the Being of beings Heidegger does not align the manipulability of beings with the human, but rather names with the human being the essential resistance of beings to τεχνη. The human becomes the essential unrepresentability of whatever is. It becomes the worlding of the world in which beings are present but which, as their condition of possibility and thus their truth, is not present itself. And it is not present because it is the non-presentability of time. Where for Aristotle the human is the only being that perceives time, for Heidegger the human is time.³³ It is in the ecstases of temporality that the human both announces its incommensurability with the animal and gives itself up to contamination.

In “Language in the Poem”, the blue deer is human not simply because it thinks and knows what a bee cannot know. It is human because, in its harkening to the stranger, it follows him elsewhere and thinks madly, i.e. differently. As Christian humanism distinguished the human from the thingly but did not question the distinctness as such of the human, it never reached beyond matters of detail to the “madness” of a critique of reification. It never thought Being as such. A famous sentence from What Is Called Thinking? (the series of lectures delivered in the same period as the composition of “Language in the Poem”) reads: “Most thought-provoking in our thought-provoking time is that we are still not thinking.”³⁴ The blue deer, which does think because it thinks differently from the thought that is properly a non-thought, accordingly satisfies the definition of the human being as the thinking animal, as animal rationale. Yet it can be said to satisfy this definition only by overlooking the fact that the otherness of its thought puts any definition whatsoever into question. Its thought is less a stable property of its animality than its madness and decay: the humanity of the blue deer is its indeterminacy. We who do not yet think are not yet human. Metaphysics prevents us from strictly meeting its definition of humanity as the animal rationale because it prevents us from thinking. But in what way are we the people who do not yet think? To what degree? Heidegger’s response in the text on Trakl is unmistakable: to the degree that we are not underway, that we resist the decomposition essential to the human.

In The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics the animal does not grasp beings as they are. And it cannot do so because it is not Being and hence not that which is the knowability of beings. The animal is insufficiently ecstatic and thus insufficiently decadent. The blue deer bears witness to the humanity that thinks itself in the animal. The humanity of the animal is the transcendence that cannot be denied to the Being of any being. To deny the animal knowledge of beings as such is not to deny its transcendence, since inasmuch as the animal is, it is transcendent. The constitution of its identity, regardless of whether this identity is rendered an object of knowledge, takes into account the world from which the animal is continuously differentiated and towards which it must always be transcending in order for the differentiation to take effect. And if Heidegger’s bee is essentially always more than a bee, can it only ever — unthinkingly — be mistaken for a bee? The ecstasy that Heidegger endows with the name of “human” is the Being of beings. Within this ecstasy, beings emerge in the distinctiveness of their individual properties by way of a suppression of their transcendent “humanity”. A stone, a twig, a length of thread, as that which is merely present-at-hand, figure among the debris of originary temporality in its disintegration into the atomistic “nows” of reification. Decay is not a secondary effect of the object; rather the object is a secondary effect of decay. Where the blue deer can be said to think, it is because in following the stranger it transcends more unreservedly than the unthinking consciousness of the epistemological subject. Thought, in the proper sense as the thought of Being, is not a procedure of an extant subject, but the essence of original temporality. The blue deer that truly thinks does not pass beyond itself only as far as an object in whose reflection it then recovers (reified consciousness is a pleonasm); instead, it thinks so intensely that it decays into the humus of the human, disappearing after the stranger into the origin.

If it is objected immediately that such an interpretation overlooks what is traditional in Heidegger’s meditations on humanity, then this appearance of conventionality would need to be demonstrated as being more than an appearance. Certainly the Greek definition of the human being — ζῷον λόγον ἔχον — is retained by Heidegger:

Nor is the capacity to speak merely one capability of human beings, on a par with the remaining ones. The capacity to speak distinguishes the human being as a human being. Such a distinguishing mark bears in itself the very design of the human essence.³⁵

That which is human speaks. The proposition occupies in Heidegger, however, the status more of a problem than of a definition. What precisely it means to speak is the question that the essay on Trakl, and the other essays in the collection On the Way to Language, attempts to raise. Heidegger repeatedly insists that the essence of language does not disclose itself in its instrumentalisation. Language is misunderstood as soon as it is held to be a means of the transmission of information; evidence of comprehension within a discourse does not in itself prove an agent's humanity.

In its efforts to demarcate the animal and the human, The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics has recourse to a discussion of the nature of language that is considerably more wary of suggesting any philosophy of consciousness:

The fact that there is an essential distinction between the vocal utterance of the animal (φωνη) and human discourse in the broadest sense is indicated by Aristotle when he says that human discourse is κατα συνθηκην, which he interprets as οταν γενηται συμβολον.³⁶

Heidegger stresses to his audience in 1929-30 that current theories of the symbol are inadequate for the purpose of understanding Aristotle's sense. What then is the symbol? Heidegger's answer closes the circle:

What Aristotle sees quite obscurely under the title συμβολον, sees only approximately, and without any explication, in looking at it quite ingeniously, is nothing other than what we today call transcendence.³⁷

The notion of the human that Heidegger defines as transcendence is thus not illuminated by the additional reference to language, since language is likewise defined as transcendence. Dasein speaks: a tautology whose deliberate emptiness displays its distance from positive determinations of humanity and of language. Dasein is whatever speaks, and in the liberated world of decay of Trakl's poetry a blackbird begins to banter with the dead cousin ("Winkel am Wald") and the ocean begins to sing ("Psalm"). Decay is the gift of tongues, and at the far side of reification everything begins to speak. Once language is expounded as transcendence, and not as the comprehensibility of utterances, can it be said that the community it founds, the Being-with-others with which Heidegger equates Dasein, is in any way exclusive? Would it not be a proof of the deficient transcendence of a community, and therefore of its deficient humanity, if it were to distinguish itself from another, from an Other?

In 1934, in the lecture course Logic as the Question Concerning the Essence of Language, Heidegger defines the Volk by language.³⁸ Given his earlier definition of language, Heidegger is not substituting the exclusive community of the speakers of a particular language for the exclusive community of the specimens of a particular racial type. The Volk of transcendence is a people that cannot extricate itself from other beings. It is incapable of standing over against beings as a subject and it is thus incapable of a more or less humane comportment toward them. Its humanitas is shown in the check that it places on the exploitation of beings by withdrawing itself, as the truth of beings, from the domain of τεχνη.

As the Volk is defined by transcendence, it cannot come up against another Volk from which it would be distinct. There can be only the one Volk. But, as Heidegger makes clear in his meditations on the Geschlecht, this is very far from amounting to a declaration of the homogeneity of the being that raises the question of Being. The community that assembles in the ecstases of originary temporality is the community of the ontological difference. In order for it to be homogeneous, it would first have to surrender to its reification within derivative temporality, whereby it would obtain in its presence the properties of its recognizable consistency. Heidegger's community is transcendent only because it is different, only because it is the transcendence that is difference itself. To grasp the Volk in its specificity as the Volk, rather than as an extant entity among extant entities, can mean nothing other than to grasp it as difference.

In 1952, the question of Being is the question of the Geschlecht. Having become the name of the being that raises the question of Being, the Geschlecht thinks the question in terms of its own difference. The Geschlecht does not think the Being of beings as the Hegelian differentiatedness of beings. Difference is to be thought on its own. Certainly early Heidegger speaks in the same way of transcendence, rejecting all interpretations that situate it as a relation between the subject and the object.³⁹ But, as the ambiguity of the example of the bee in The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics shows, transcendence is not always clearly distinguished from the knowledge that one being has of another being. Transcendence, as the possibility of community, is that which later becomes the difference of the Geschlecht. It is the ontological difference, of which Heidegger writes in “The Onto-Theo-Logical Constitution of Metaphysics”:

Thus we think of Being rigorously only when we think of it in its difference with beings, and of beings in their difference with Being. The difference thus comes specifically into view. If we try to form a representational idea of it, we will at once be misled into conceiving of difference as a relation which our representing has added to Being and to beings. Thus the difference is reduced to a distinction, something made up by our understanding (Verstand).⁴⁰

The difference between Being and beings — in short, transcendence — is reduced to a distinction of the positivity of the understanding when it is formulated as a distinct being that relates Being and beings as though from outside. In order to avoid such a reification of the ontological difference, it is necessary to think this difference in its immanence to Being and beings. It is necessary to think it in its originarity as the clearing of both Being and beings.

Heidegger's lecture "Language" endeavours to rethink difference in the course of an exegesis of Trakl's poem "Ein Winterabend": "The difference (Unter-Schied) is neither distinction nor relation. The difference is in the highest instance the dimension for world and thing."⁴¹ Heidegger here hyphenates the German word for difference, "Unterschied", and in thus drawing attention to its elements "unter" ("under") and "Schied" ("division") suggests a possibility of understanding difference that is more originary than division and that is hence neither distinction nor relation — difference as the sub-lime, as the passage under the threshold between entities and as the condition of possibility of beings in their multiplicity. This originary difference is not, for Heidegger, the Being that Hegel identifies with the differentiatedness of beings. This originary difference clears Being even in its withdrawal from the recognisability of the differentiatedness of beings. It is the difference of the Geschlecht and the basis for its community.

In his reading of Trakl's verse, "Ein Geschlecht" (One Geschlecht) in "Language in the Poem", Heidegger again emphasises that difference is not the product of negotiations within a binary:

The "one" in "one Geschlecht" does not mean "one" instead of "two".

The "one" also does not mean the monotony of dull equality. "One Geschlecht" does not at all name any biological fact, neither the condition of being of the one sex ("Eingeschlechtlichkeit") nor that of being of the same sex ("Gleichgeschlechtlichkeit"). In the emphatic "one Geschlecht", that uniting element conceals itself which unifies out of the spiritual night's gathering blueness.⁴²

Heidegger discounts here a series of interpretations of Trakl's verse on the basis solely of their one-sidedness. Oneness, when coupled with the Geschlecht, becomes the oneness of multiplicity. Trakl's "one Geschlecht" is not so much a unity as that which unifies, although it does not unify in the same way as the Greek One of un-concealment. Trakl's "one Geschlecht" conceals itself as the unifying element of the ontological difference. It names the humanity of this difference, as Heidegger writes:

Accordingly, the word "Geschlecht" here retains the full manifold meaning already named. It names at once the historical Geschlecht of man, humanity in its difference from all other living beings (plants and animals). The word "Geschlecht" names then the Geschlechter, tribes, clans, families of this human Geschlecht. At the same time, the word "Geschlecht" always names the twofold of the Geschlechter.⁴³

The Geschlecht that is insinuated to be difference itself cannot be distinguished from other living things as though it were one living thing among others. It is different from them as the difference from which they break towards their distinct identities as plants and animals. It is the Geschlecht informing them as the possibility of their determinacy and indeterminacy.

"Geschlecht" is a word that names difference because it is a poetic word. What it names is originary and, for that reason, can only be named poetically. As Heidegger asserts elsewhere in On the Way to Language, the poetic has nothing to do with the secondariness and derivativeness of the ornamental:

Poetry proper is never merely a higher mode (melos) of everyday language. It is rather the reverse: everyday language is a forgotten and therefore used-up poem, from which there hardly resounds a call any longer.⁴⁴

As everyday language is a used-up poem, it is not by adding senses to the univocality of everyday language that one arrives at poetry. “Geschlecht” is a poetic word in its multiplicity, but this multiplicity is poorly understood as the aggregate of its senses. The multiplicity has to be thought in its originary simplicity. The meaning of the word “Geschlecht” is manifold because it lies in the poetic character of this word not to give itself up to the unequivocality of that which is apprehended in the light of presence. The manifold meaning of the word is a consequence of the originarity that prevents it from ever fully being unconcealed. The poetic word “Geschlecht” thus names the human in its status as an exception to the understanding of Being as presence. In this respect, the Geschlecht is a descendent of the German Volk of Heidegger’s commentaries on Hölderlin. But with the essay on Trakl in 1952, the being that raises the question of Being has shed its ties to nationalism and aligned itself with difference.

Heidegger begins “Language in the Poem” with a question after the site of Trakl’s poetry and suggests that it is difference itself:

The site gathers unto itself, supremely and in the extreme. That which gathers penetrates and pervades everything. The site, that which gathers, draws into itself, preserves that which it has drawn in, not like an immuring capsule, but rather by illuminating and shining through what has been gathered, and which only thus is released into its own essence.⁴⁵

Only difference is able to unify as well as preserve. As the site of Trakl's work, difference is, in a sense, this work itself. And because difference cannot be hypostasized, the work is in some way a non-work:

The poem (Gedicht) of a poet remains unspoken. None of the individual texts (Dichtungen), not even their totality, says everything. Nonetheless, each text speaks out of the whole of the single poem and at every turn enunciates this poem.⁴⁶

Just as there is only the one Geschlecht for Heidegger and Trakl, there is for Heidegger only the one poem. And that which allows the poem and the Geschlecht to unify, hinders them from being present-at-hand.

Exactly why the poem of a poet remains unspoken is not stated. In Nietzsche, however, Heidegger explains why the thought (more precisely, the Un-thought) of a thinker remains similarly unspoken. There, in a very un-Hegelian manner, he speaks of the inevitable transgression in commenting upon the Un-thought of another thinker:

Every thinker oversteps the inner limit of every thinker. But such overstepping is not "knowing it all," since it only consists in holding the thinker in the direct claim of Being, thus remaining within his limitations. This limitation consists in the fact that the thinker can never himself say what is most of all his own. It must remain unsaid, because what is sayable receives its determination from what is not sayable. What is most of all the thinker's own, however, is not his possession, but rather belongs to Being whose transmission thinking receives in its projects.⁴⁷

For Heidegger, the Un-thought of a thinker is not a deficiency for which the thinker can be held to account. Unlike Hegel, for whom the task of thinking is the task of bringing everything to thought, Heidegger concerns himself with the Un-thought for the sake of its resistance to presence.

Commentary on the work of a poet is, as it were, a matter of attending to the determining element of the unspoken poem. Commentary takes as its object less the plurality of distinct poems by which the Geschlecht has been cursed than the decay that is their unity and condition of possibility.⁴⁸ The charge of misreading repeatedly levelled at Heidegger's text on Trakl registers, but fails to understand, that it has taken the unspoken poem as its object.⁴⁹ The violence of Heidegger's reading, as it bears on the discord of that which is said of the Geschlecht, is a corollary of the attempt to think the Geschlecht in the un-said gentleness of its simple twofold.

In any case, the question must arise for even the crudest understanding of Trakl's poetry whether fidelity is itself an appropriate criterion in judging discussions of his texts. Fidelity to what? Sense is conspicuously a side-effect in these compositions. Modesto Carone Netto⁵⁰, on account of the repetition and repositioning of images, ascribes to Trakl a technique and practice such as that which Burroughs later employed and propagated under the name of "cut-up". Trakl's poetry has been analysed as a montage of quotations by Alfred Doppler⁵¹ as by Rudolf D. Schier⁵², who discovers in two verses by Trakl allusions to the Book of Samuel, the Gospel of Saint John, Hölderlin's "Der Winkel von Hahrdt" and Ammer's translation of Rimbaud. Trakl develops an art of quotation quite distinct from that of his contemporary Karl Kraus. The quotation in Trakl is not the object of attack. It is more the symptom of a decomposition. Kraus's personality, which stands over against the quotations and unites them, has no exact counterpart in Trakl. Trakl simply plagiarises. This defect is, strictly speaking, his great strength. Trakl resists the temptation to produce a work: the deterritorialisation of the individual quoted verses is not thwarted by a reterritorialisation on any notion of the poet's "authentic" voice.⁵³ Trakl's singular poem is elsewhere. The Geschlecht is hidden. And it cannot be more thoroughly hidden than on the surface: Richard Detsch⁵⁴ contends that Trakl's verse "Ein Geschlecht" is itself a quotation of Novalis, whereas Ursula Heckmann⁵⁵ believes that Otto Weininger is its inspiration. The singularity of the Geschlecht does not isolate the Traklian corpus as its determining principle, since it must for its own part be understood from out of that abyssal absence of such a determining principle which is Trakl's innovation as a montage artist.

Commenting on the notion of singularity in "Language in the Poem", but misapprehending its abyssality, Derrida justly asserts that Heidegger is unwilling to position Trakl within metaphysics, let alone Christian theology:

On the contrary, he intends to show that Trakl's Gedicht (his poetic work if not his poems) has not only crossed the limit of onto-theology: it allows us to think such a crossing [franchissement] which is also an enfranchisement [affranchissement]. This enfranchisement, still equivocal in Hölderlin [...] is univocal in Trakl.⁵⁶

For Heidegger, as Derrida writes, Trakl's Gedicht is beyond metaphysics. Trakl's Gedicht has crossed the limit of onto-theology and thereby accomplished what "On the Question of Being" declares to be impossible. By means here of an allusion to Heidegger's critique of Jünger's conviction of the violability of the limits of nihilism, Derrida attempts to implicate Heidegger in a self-contradiction. Yet the analysis promptly breaks off before it has become evident that Heidegger understands Trakl's Gedicht metaphysically. Only if Trakl's Gedicht is understood in terms of an exclusive identity, could it be said to resemble the entities of metaphysics it is claimed to have left behind on this side of the limit of onto-theology. But Trakl's singular poem is not a distinct entity present-at-hand, and although Derrida acknowledges in a parenthesis that Heidegger draws a distinction between Trakl's poem and poems, he does not allow the singular poem's difference from the extantness of the poems to interfere with his criticism. Heidegger does not advance Trakl's missing poem as an alternative and rival to metaphysics. Trakl's missing poem is not to be encountered with metaphysical distinctness on the other side of the limit of onto-theology. The Gedicht is more originary than metaphysics because it is decadent. It is too decadent to cross the line and survive intact.

The Gedicht is, furthermore, too decadent to bear the discrete and proper name of Georg Trakl. Heidegger reads through the individual poems to Being. Unless "Georg Trakl" is seen as a cipher in "Language in the Poem", unless his poem, following Heidegger on the very first page of the text, is grasped as absent, little more than a mythologisation of a poetic corpus may appear. The decadence that emerges within Trakl's poetry does not come to a halt before the proper name. Decay liberates — within the poetry itself as well as the poetry from itself. In an important respect, Trakl reads like the Baroque poets he studied. Generic figures populate his poems — the stranger, the shepherds, the lepers, the lonely, the soldiers — in a world where everything has been ordered. And yet decay sets in against this stultification. In "Ruh und Schweigen" (v. 11-12) Trakl writes:

A radiant youth

Appears the sister in autumn and black decay.

Under the pressure of decay, the celestial division of labour yields and the sister changes and does not change her sex. She becomes. That she appears a gleaming youth is an “illusion” fomented by decay, whereby decay is both noted and overlooked. The image of the gleaming youth collects itself within decay and steps forth from it consistent and recognizable. Decay as such never appears and it never can appear as such. Decay, like Trakl’s poem and like Being, is missing.

Trakl’s singular poem decays into discrete verses. It falls away from itself in becoming the extant work. Decay is by no means unilateral: the verses decay towards the singular poem and the singular poem decays towards the verses. Or again, the singular poem is decay itself. The composed is a decomposition of decomposition. That Heidegger, in his commentary, wishes to mark such a distinction within decay is explicit in his description of Elis:

Elis is not one who has died and who decays (verwest) in the lateness of the lived-out. Elis is the dead who dis-essences (entwest) into earliness. This stranger unfolds the human essence forward into the beginning of what has not yet come to be borne.⁵⁷

The “Entwesung” of Elis is a decay that is not so much a falling-away as a falling-towards, since it is in and as decay, and the demolition of all previous articulations of humanity, that the human essence comes to light in its originarity. Falling away from this essence, succumbing to a resistance to decay, humanity is estranged from itself.

Heidegger comments:

The wanderers who follow the stranger at once see themselves parted “from loved ones” who, for them, are “others”. The others — that is the cast (Schlag) of the decayed form of humanity.⁵⁸

In their first steps after the stranger, the wanderers are still under the curse laid upon the Geschlecht. They view themselves as different from other beings rather than as difference itself, rather than as decay. The curse that drives the Geschlecht out of the unity of difference into the discord of the opposed effects itself in the decay of decay. The curse, however, does not bring about a reversal of decay, since it conceals rather than heals. But in any case is decay something to be healed?

In a letter to Jean-Michel Palmier, Heidegger insists that decay is to be understood neither existentially nor anthropologically, but ontologically.⁵⁹ In Being and Time, to whose passages on decay (Verfallenheit) Heidegger refers Palmier, there appears the following:

In falling [als verfallendes], Dasein itself as factual Being-in-the-world, is something from which it has already fallen away. And it has not fallen into some entity which it comes upon for the first time in the course of its being, or even one which it has not come upon at all; it has fallen into the world, which itself belongs to its Being.⁶⁰

Dasein can never not be decaying as it is essentially transcendent. At most, it can disguise its worldhood in the opposition of discord. The intimacy of decay, of transcendence and of being-outside-of-itself is not simply cancelled out by discord, since it is the precondition of the latter.

Only within the unity of the Geschlecht can dissension arise. This unity, which is the difference of the Geschlecht, cannot accordingly be opposed to discord as though the one excluded the other. They are not options facing human communities. It is not a matter of “instantiating”, within a specific social body, the differential unity of the Geschlecht in the name of an imputedly Heideggerian politics. The feasibility of such an instantiation would depend upon a restriction of the unifying scope of the Geschlecht, and thus upon its demotion from difference itself. The unity of the Geschlecht is not a Utopia waiting to be realised.⁶¹ From the “realisation” of its unity, the Geschlecht can only expect impoverishment through the loss of the ages in which it was not realised and in which, as supposedly unrealised, it still gathered itself as its difference from its realisation.

Heidegger’s voluntaristic tone when he speaks of the Geschlecht is ambiguous:

The proper cast lies only with that Geschlecht whose twoness leaves discord behind and wanders ahead into the gentleness of a simple twofold, i.e. is strange and thus follows the stranger.

Heidegger is not here detailing a course of action undertaken by knowing subjects assembled in the Geschlecht and by which they differentiate themselves from others. The Geschlecht of which he speaks is the ubiquitous, yet everywhere concealed, Geschlecht of Being. Being is always geschlechtlich, but there is no chosen Geschlecht. Every Geschlecht has always already been chosen and any comportment on its part towards difference can never appropriate its election, since difference is prior to comportment and overreaches it. The subject that comports itself towards difference, with the gentility it imagines appropriate, merely aligns itself with discord. By its comportment the subject cannot make good the discord in which it is grounded in its opposition to the object and by which the Geschlecht is cursed. The unity of the Geschlecht is not identical with the reciprocated indulgence of the subjects of liberalism. The last thing that Heidegger could be expected to say would be that the curse of the Geschlecht is lifted in liberal democracies with their prided tolerance. In any case, the curse cannot be lifted in favour of decay, since the curse is itself also decay — the condition of possibility for that atomization manifest in the discord of the Geschlecht lies, for Heidegger, in the decadence of derivative temporality (die verfallende Zeitigungsart).

The gentleness of the twofold of the Geschlecht is thus too inclusive to be taken for a political model. Derrida, in Geschlecht IV “Heidegger’s Ear: Philopolemology”, dwells upon the equivocality of the figure of the friend in Being and Time and thereby emphasises the distance between Heidegger’s conception of community and a peaceful co-existence:

[A] larger context [...] seems to indicate that for Heidegger φιλεῖν, on the nonpsychological, nonanthropological, nonethicopolitical plane of the existential analytic and above all of the question of being or φύσις, welcomes within itself, in its very accord, many other modes than that of friendliness, but as well opposition, tension, confrontation, rejection, [...] if not war, at least Kampf or πόλεμος. [...] To be opposed to the friend, to turn away from it, to defy it, to not hear it, that is still to hear and keep it, to carry with self, bei sich tragen, the voice of the friend.⁶²

The friendship that, as Being-with, is definitive of the human being lies outside the gift of the subject. Dasein is essentially and thus inalienably befriended. Even in its seemingly most fundamental isolation, Dasein continues within a community of some kind and of which it stands forever in need, if only so that its isolation might assert itself. Underneath the discord between the isolated individual and the community, there prevails the tenderness of the unitary Geschlecht in its transcendence. The Being-with of the Geschlecht that is definitive of the human being disappears from view in discord. As a result, Dasein confines itself to its isolation and yet sets itself at variance with solitude. It never beholds itself as fully human and never knows itself as estranged simply from an oxymoronic image of the human. That is to say, in the discord that is the element of its reification the subject fails to perceive its inhumanity. The community from which Dasein can never break is the community of difference. Its specificity is not constituted by exclusion. Hence it cannot limit itself to the concourse of a given species of primates. The age of loneliness which in 1938 Heidegger believes must fall over the earth is to scatter the spurious communities that settle in the discord of the Geschlecht, disclosing as it were the ecstatic community of the lonely.

Already in the 1934-5 lecture course, Hölderlin's Hymns "Germanien" and "Der Rhein", Heidegger writes:

The manner of togetherness of the singular, its world-character, is solitude. It does not separate and expel, but rather bears forth into that originary unity which no community has ever attained.⁶³

It is for such a non-exclusive community that Heidegger reserves the words "friendship" and "tenderness". And that he should tear these words away from any oppositionality, denying that friendship excludes antagonism, that tenderness is at odds with decay, is not irrelevant to his ambition to think difference as other than a binary and a curse.

But in what sense do the binary and the curse nonetheless remain in place?

Heidegger, enquiring into the nature of the language in Trakl's poetry, declares:

It speaks by answering to that journey on which the stranger moves in advance. The path upon which he has struck out leads away from the old degenerate Geschlecht. It offers company on the way to the decline into the preserved earliness of the unborn Geschlecht. The language of the poem that has its site in departedness answers to the homecoming of the unborn human Geschlecht into the peaceful beginning of its quieter essence.⁶⁴

Does the unborn Geschlecht still fall under the sway of discord, inasmuch as it distinguishes itself from its degenerate double? Such a conclusion appears inescapable if the notion of homecoming in the above passage is stripped of its radicality. The home of the Geschlecht cannot properly stand over against the homelessness of its degeneration and reification unless it is indeterminate, and as indeterminate its opposition is therefore essentially an inclusion. The path of the stranger leads nowhere and it is in this nowhere that the Geschlecht finds its home. The place of Trakl's poem is, strictly speaking, a no-place. And yet Heidegger writes:

The situality of the site that gathers Trakl's work into itself is the concealed essence of departedness, and is called "Evening Land", the Occident.

However, the West as the land of evening, as the land of decay, is too dissolute to be present-at-hand. Decay is not something that has struck the West. On the contrary, it is its essence. If, in 1912, Trakl wonders whether he should emigrate to Borneo⁶⁵, then there is no necessity that dictates that this should be interpreted as a fantasized flight from the decadence of high capitalism. Decay in Trakl's poetry cannot be reduced to a moral phenomenon and just as Rimbaud, in "L'Impossible", discovers the East in the West, Trakl may have been hoping to come upon the truth of the West in the tropical, and thus more rampant, decomposition of the Indonesian archipelago. When Heidegger ascribes to Trakl a single, yet missing, poem, it is perhaps with an intimation that the decay in Trakl's poems was, for Trakl, himself deficient. The substantiality of the poems is, as it were, an obstacle to the decay that they invoke. Trakl's singular poem is the non-work of the West, and it is by means of the absolute and Utopian decay of its impossibility that it satirically condemns, and in condemning embraces, the partially decomposed figures of the poems themselves. The Geschlecht is missing, but only as such can it constitute a human community.

Conclusion

Heidegger's conception of the Volk cannot be extricated from his engagement with National Socialism. Its importance as a factor in his decision to join the NSDAP was simply too great. And yet its role in determining Heidegger's commitment to Hitler is an insufficient reason for identifying Heidegger's conception of the Volk with the National Socialist conception of the Aryan "type" (Art). Heidegger's people does not take its definition from biologism. It is, however, through the very radicality with which he rejected biologism that Heidegger is unable to keep his conception of the Volk at a distance from the Nazi reification of humanity. Rejecting biologism even to its foundations in the Dingbegriffe of classical ontology, Heidegger elaborates a conception of the Volk that does not rely on the metaphysical understanding of Being as presence. Heidegger's people is not a being that gives itself up to be apprehended in the light of presence, biologically or otherwise. It is a being-outside-of-itself. As such, it is essentially corrupt and therefore lacks the means to avoid contamination with the purity of the Aryan "type". But in the fundamental impurity of Heidegger's Volk, in the stain of its Nazism, there has also to be discerned a resistance to the regime that extends further than any other resistance. Heidegger's opposition is inextricable from acquiescence because it derives from an opposition to the understanding of beings on which Nazism erected its apparatus of terror. The stain on Heidegger's people is a consequence of its undecidability and the challenge it presents to the very possibility of control.

For Heidegger, this undecidability is the essence of the German Volk. It is likewise the essence of Dasein. But is undecidability not annulled through its determination as "German"? And does not the direct association of the Volk with Dasein reduce non-German peoples, in a gesture reminiscent of Nazi racism, to beings present-at-hand? What Heidegger means by “German” is, however, at once orthodox and heterodox. The undecidability of Heidegger’s Volk is the consummation and destruction of the complacent anti-positivism of the tradition of German cultural nationalism. Heidegger’s people does not congeal into a stable identity over against the present-at-hand. With Heidegger, the anti-positivism of German cultural nationalism is thought through to a conception of the Volk that contests the determination of beings under the metaphysics of presence. German nationalism hence becomes, for Heidegger, inseparable from the question of the Being of Dasein. The Volk, through understanding its own difference from the Being of the present-at-hand, is able to understand the Being that is proper to Dasein and that has gone unthought since the inception of classical ontology. The Volk’s direct association with Dasein is its proximity to an understanding of its Being. Accordingly, the uprising of the German people under Hitler was able to assume in Heidegger’s eyes the aspect of a will to the question of Being. In the prevailing preoccupation with the specificity of the Volk, Heidegger was willing to see an engagement with the ontological specificity of Dasein, rather than a hierarchization of races.

In the name of the Volk of the question of Being, Heidegger expressed his allegiance to the State in 1933. And in the name of this conception of the Germans, Heidegger likewise resigned the rectorship of Freiburg University and directed his attention to poetry. Heidegger’s people is the people promised first by Hitler and then by Hölderlin. The transition from the State to poetry was not a transition from the biologically distinct people of National Socialism to the people of Hölderlin’s non-positive nationalism. In 1933 Heidegger’s Volk is arguably still more a being-outside-of-itself than the Volk of the subsequent lectures on poetry, because it is the people whose impurity encompasses even biologism. In Heidegger’s refusal and overdetermined inability to extricate himself from National Socialism, the Volk remains in an uncanny play of substitution with the specimens of the Aryan race. Heidegger's people thereby evades the mission of thinking Dasein's difference from the present-at-hand and nonetheless thinks this difference in the impurity proper to it.

Notes

Introduction

¹ See Karl Löwith, Mein Leben in Deutschland vor und nach 1933, excerpt translated as “My Last Meeting with Heidegger in Rome, 1936” by Richard Wolin in The Heidegger Controversy. A Critical Reader, ed. Richard Wolin (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1993), p. 142.

² Cf. Johannes Fritzsche, Historical Destiny and National Socialism in Heidegger's “Being and Time” (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1999), p. 126: “Even if, however, the section on historicity stood alone and were not preceded by the sections on falling and on conscience and solicitude, one sees easily that Heidegger's concept of historicity is identical to Hitler's and Scheler's ideas of history and thus politically on the Right.” Without the mythical past of the pure race or the restoration of objective ethical values it is not at all easy to see that Heidegger's concept of historicity is identical either to Hitler's or Scheler's. However, the more general charge of the reactionary character of Heidegger's concept of historicity is not so quickly answered.

³ Sonya Sikka, “Heidegger's Concept of Volk” in The Philosophical Forum 26 (Winter 1994), p. 122.

⁴ Ibid., p. 121.

⁵ Heidegger, “Ansprache am 11. November in Leipzig” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, ed. Hermann Heidegger in Gesamtausgabe (Frankfurt am Main: Vittorio Klostermann, 2000), GA 16, p. 191. Further references to the Gesamtausgabe (1975-) will use the abbreviation “GA”.

⁶ See Erich Jaensch, Die Wissenschaft und die deutsche völkische Bewegung (Marburg: N. G. Ewert, 1933).

⁷ Heidegger, Being and Time, trans. John Macquarrie and Edward Robinson (London: SCM Press, 1962), p. 62.

⁸ Heidegger, Sein und Zeit, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1977), GA 2, p. 51n.

⁹ Aristotle, Metaphysica in The Works of Aristotle, trans. W. D. Ross (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1908-52), vol. 8, 998b.

¹⁰ Kant's thesis, according to Heidegger, possesses an antecedent in Suarez's commentary on Aristotle. See Heidegger, The Basic Problems of Phenomenology, trans. Albert Hofstadter (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982), p. 97.

¹¹ Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, trans. Norman Kemp Smith (London: Macmillan, 1933), A 598 B 626.

¹² Ibid., A 600, B 628.

¹³ Kierkegaard, Concluding Unscientific Postscript to Philosophical Fragments, trans. Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992), p. 330.

¹⁴ Heidegger, “Erläuterungen und Grundsätzliches” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 414.

¹⁵ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 436. Translation modified.

¹⁶ Hans Sluga, Heidegger's Crisis. Philosophy and Politics in Nazi Germany (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1993), p. 136.

¹⁷ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 428.

¹⁸ Ibid., p. 67.

¹⁹ Heidegger, “The Rectorate 1933/34: Facts and Thoughts” in Martin Heidegger and National Socialism. Questions and Answers, eds. Günther Neske and Emil Kettering, trans. Lisa Harries (New York: Paragon House, 1990), p. 19.

²⁰ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 436.

²¹ Ibid., p. 163.

²² Ibid., p. 155.

²³ Ibid., p. 164.

²⁴ Ibid.

²⁵ Ibid., p. 165.

²⁶ Georg Lukács, Die Zerstörung der Vernunft (Neuwied am Rhein: Luchterhand, 1962), p. 440.

- ²⁷ Pierre Bourdieu, The Political Ontology of Martin Heidegger, trans. Peter Collier (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1991), p. 79.
- ²⁸ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 167.
- ²⁹ Ibid., p. 168.
- ³⁰ Heidegger, "Homecoming/To Kindred Ones" in Elucidations of Hölderlin's Poetry, trans. Keith Hoeller (New York: Humanity Books, 2000), p. 48.
- ³¹ Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, ed. Susanne Ziegler (1980), GA 39, p. 56.
- ³² Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymne »Andenken«, ed. Cud Ochswadt (1982), GA 52, p. 131.
- ³³ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 447.
- ³⁴ On the people that is born in Romanticism, see Ernst Anrich in his foreword to Ernst Moritz Arndt, Germanien und Europa (Stuttgart-Berlin: W. Kohlhammer, 1940), p. 7: "For in the hard struggle to distinguish properly the completely new from the ideas of 1789 and the powers of absolutism this minority was not able to come to a full inner victory or to penetrate the nation to such an extent that, even after 1815, the nation retained the thought in its clarity. What rather took place was the reversion and renewed collapse into the ideas of rationalism in the nineteenth century. Only the far more encompassing and consistent breakthrough of the same idea in the National Socialist revolution has repulsed this."
- ³⁵ Cf. Marx's letter of May 1843 to Arnold Ruge in Early Texts, trans. David McLellan (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1971), p. 74 in which he rebuffs him for quoting the well-known denunciation of the Germans in Hölderlin's Hyperion as a description of present conditions: "Your letter, my dear friend, is a good elegy, a choking elegy; but it is definitely not political. No people despairs." Marx's objection is that what in Hölderlin had been politically apposite has, in the space of a few decades, become merely "literary".
- ³⁶ Ernest Renan, "La Guerre entre la France et l'Allemagne" in Qu'est-ce qu'une Nation? (Paris: Imprimerie nationale, 1996), p. 163.
- ³⁷ Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus, trans. Brian Massumi (London: Athlone, 1988) p. 340.
- ³⁸ See Georg Christoph Lichtenberg, Aphorisms, trans. R. J. Hollingdale (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1990), p. 78: "Even if they were of use for nothing else, the poets of antiquity at least enable us here and there to get to know the opinions of the common people. [...] For our folksongs are often full of a mythology known to no one but the fool who made the folksong."
- ³⁹ Hegel, The Philosophy of History, trans. J. Sibree (New York: Dover, 1956), pp. 451-3.
- ⁴⁰ Hegel, "The English Reform Bill" in Political Writings, trans. T. M. Knox (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1964), p. 329.
- ⁴¹ For a discussion of the conditions favouring a politicization of Darwin's theories in nineteenth-century Germany, see Daniel Gasman, The Scientific Origins of National Socialism: Social Darwinism in Ernst Haeckel and the German Monist League (London: Macdonald & Co., 1971).
- ⁴² Fichte, Addresses to the German Nation, trans. R. F. Jones and G. H. Turnbull (New York: Harper Torchbook, 1968), p. 107.
- ⁴³ Heidegger, An Introduction to Metaphysics, trans. Ralph Manheim (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1959), p. 199.
- ⁴⁴ Rainer Marten, "Ein rassistisches Konzept von Humanität" in Badische Zeitung, 19-20.12.1987, p. 14.
- ⁴⁵ Silvio Vietta, Heideggers Kritik am Nationalsozialismus und an der Technik (Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1989), pp. 91-2.
- ⁴⁶ Heidegger, An Introduction to Metaphysics, pp. 37-9. Translation modified.
- ⁴⁷ See, for instance, Hegel's comments on the decline of philosophy in all nations except Germany in his "Rede zum Antritt des philosophischen Lehramtes an der Universität Berlin" in Vorlesungsmanuskripte II (1816-1831) in Gesammelte Werke (Hamburg: Felix Meiner, 1995), vol. 18, p. 15: "This science has taken its refuge among the Germans and lives alone still in them; to us the preservation of this holy light has been entrusted, and it is our vocation to care for it and to feed it, and to see to it that the highest that man can possess, the self-consciousness of his essence, is not extinguished and destroyed."
- ⁴⁸ Jacques Derrida, Of Spirit: Heidegger and the Question, trans. Geoff Bennington and Rachel Bowlby (Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1984), pp. 39-40.
- ⁴⁹ Jean-Pierre Faye, Langages totalitaires (Paris: Hermann, 1972), p. 199.

⁵⁰ Heidegger, "Wege zur Aussprache" in Aus der Erfahrung des Denkens, ed. Hermann Heidegger (1983), GA 13, p. 17.

⁵¹ Hitler, Mein Kampf, trans. Ralph Manheim (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1943), p. 56.

⁵² Nietzsche, Beyond Good and Evil, trans. R. J. Hollingdale (Penguin: Harmondsworth, 1990), p. 176.

⁵³ Emmanuel Lévinas, "Reflections on the Philosophy of Hitlerism", trans. Séan Hand in Critical Inquiry 17 (Autumn 1990), p. 70.

⁵⁴ Ibid.

⁵⁵ Ernst Krieck, "Germanischer Mythos und Heideggersche Philosophie" in Volk im Werden (1934) included in Nachlese zu Heidegger, ed. Guido Schneeberger (Bern: 1962), pp. 225-6.

⁵⁶ See, for instance, in the collection of essays by Jean Beaufret, De l'existentialisme à Heidegger (Paris: J. Vrin, 1986), the 1945 text, "Qu'est-ce que l'existentialisme?", pp. 146-7 and from 1974, "L'«énormité» de Heidegger", p. 162.

⁵⁷ Ulrich Sieg, "Die Verjudung des deutschen Geistes" in Die Zeit, Hamburg, 22 December 1989, p. 50.

An excerpt from Heidegger's letter to Victor Schoerer, Ministerialrat and head of the Baden department of higher education, reads: "it concerns nothing less than the urgent reflection on the choice before which we stand either to bring once again to our German spiritual life genuine native forces and educators or to deliver it up definitively to the growing Judaization in the broader and narrower sense."

⁵⁸ Jürgen Habermas, The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity, trans. Frederick Lawrence (Cambridge: Polity, 1987), p. 154.

⁵⁹ Cf. the reading of the Contributions to Philosophy offered in Alexander Schwan, "Heideggers „Beiträge zur Philosophie“ und die Politik" in Martin Heidegger. Kunst-Politik-Technik, eds. Christoph Jamme and Karsten Harries (Munich: Wilhelm Fink, 1992), p. 185: "Heidegger is consequently now no longer able to associate himself with this folkish science and Weltanschauung as in 1933."

⁶⁰ Heidegger, Contributions to Philosophy, trans. Parvis Emad and Kenneth Maly (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999), p. 103. Translation modified.

⁶¹ Cf. The exposition in Richard Polt, "Metaphysical Liberalism in Heidegger's Beiträge zur Philosophie" in Political Theory 25 (October 1997), p. 665: "Liberalism concerns itself with the maintenance and defense of the 'I'; Nazism concerns itself with the maintenance and defense of the Volk, which in this worldview reduces to nothing but a larger 'I' — a willing, representing, power-seeking ego on the scale of an entire race. In both cases, the essence of man is taken for granted and is a form of subjectivity; what is lost is historical openness to Being. However, Heidegger by no means abandons the idea of the Volk but makes the essence of the people reside in an elite who are capable of creatively interpreting the truth of Being." Once elitism has been attributed to Heidegger, his critique of subjectivity and the will to power loses its coherence.

⁶² Heidegger, Parmenides, trans. André Schuwer (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992), p. 137.

⁶³ Heidegger, "Abendgespräch in einem Kriegsgefangenenlager in Rußland zwischen einem Jüngeren und einem Älteren" in Feldweg-Gespräche (1944/45), ed. Ingrid Schüßler (1995), GA 77, pp. 235-6.

⁶⁴ Ibid., p. 236.

⁶⁵ Heidegger, "Letter on 'Humanism'", trans. Frank A. Capuzzi in Pathmarks, ed. William McNeill (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), p. 260.

⁶⁶ Heidegger, Nietzsche, trans. Frank A. Capuzzi, Joan Stambaugh and David Farrell Krell (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), vol. 3, p. 231.

⁶⁷ See, for example, Robert J. Dostal, "The Public and the People: Heidegger's Illiberal Politics" in The Review of Metaphysics 47 (March 1994), p. 552: "The over-generalized absurdity of Heidegger's critique is similarly apparent in his attack on leading Nazi intellectuals and on Nazi 'people's science' (völkische Wissenschaft) as liberal. Here we see the truth of the claim that Heidegger was unknowing about politics and apolitical."

⁶⁸ F. M. Barnard, Herder's Social and Political Thought: From Enlightenment to Nationalism (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1965), pp. 166-7.

⁶⁹ Heidegger, Logik als die Frage nach dem Wesen der Sprache, ed. Günter Seubold (1998), GA 38, p. 169.

⁷⁰ Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe, Heidegger, Art and Politics, trans. Chris Turner (London: Basil Blackwell, 1990), p. 95.

⁷¹ For a report of this colloquium, see Jean-Paul Aron, Les modernes (Paris: Gallimard, 1984), p. 122.

- ⁷² Deleuze and Guattari, What is Philosophy?, trans. Hugh Tomlinson and Graham Burchill (London: Verso, 1994), p. 109.
- ⁷³ Ibid., p. 108.
- ⁷⁴ Ibid., p. 109.
- ⁷⁵ Reported in Heinrich Wigand Petzet, Encounters and Dialogues with Martin Heidegger: 1929-1976, trans. Parvis Emad and Kenneth Maly (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993), p. 37.
- ⁷⁶ Deleuze and Guattari, What is Philosophy?, p. 109.
- ⁷⁷ Ibid., p. 108.
- ⁷⁸ Deleuze, Cinema 2: The Time-Image, trans. Hugh Tomlinson and Robert Galeta (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1989), p. 220.
- ⁷⁹ Heidegger, "Die gegenwärtige Lage und die künftige Aufgabe der deutschen Philosophie" in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 333.
- ⁸⁰ Heidegger, "Hölderlin's Earth and Heaven" in Elucidations of Hölderlin's Poetry, pp. 200-1.
- ⁸¹ Heidegger, "Die deutsche Universität" in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 302.
- ⁸² Instead of noting the inconsistency with Being and Time of such utterances from 1933-4, Dieter Thomä in Die Zeit des Selbst und die Zeit danach (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1990) attributes to Dasein a oneness of which the Volk of National Socialism would be simply a recasting. Heidegger's analysis in the earlier work of Being-with-one-another, which is an exposition explicitly of transcendence rather than of a monolithic form, is for Thomä not of central significance because it does not turn upon love and communication (p. 544). But how are love and communication comprehensible without a prior interpretation of Being-with-one-another?
- ⁸³ Hobbes, Leviathan, ed. Richard Tuck (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991), p. 114.
- ⁸⁴ Hobbes, De Cive, ed. Howard Warrender (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983), p. 151.
- ⁸⁵ Heidegger, "Zum Semesterbeginn (3. November 1933)" in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 184.
- ⁸⁶ Hegel, The History of Philosophy, trans. E. S. Haldane (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1955), vol. 1, p. 60.
- ⁸⁷ Heidegger, What is Philosophy?, trans. William Kluback and Jean T. Wilde (London: Vision Press, 1956), p. 31.
- ⁸⁸ Heidegger, "Only a God Can Save Us", trans. Maria P. Alter and John D. Caputo in The Heidegger Controversy, p. 104. See also Otto Pöggeler, Die Frage nach der Kunst: Von Hegel zu Heidegger (Freiburg/München: Alber, 1984), p. 30 where Pöggeler records a remark by Heidegger from 1974 lamenting the destructiveness of democracy.
- ⁸⁹ Kant, Perpetual Peace (New York: Columbia University Press, 1939), p. 15.

I The Death of Hegel

- ¹ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 438.
- ² Heidegger, Die Kategorien- und Bedeutungslehre des Duns Scotus in Frühe Schriften, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1978), GA 1, p. 411.
- ³ Heidegger, "Die Idee der Philosophie und das Weltanschauungsproblem" in Zur Bestimmung der Philosophie, ed. Bernd Heimbüchel (1987), GA 56/57, p. 97.
- ⁴ Hans A. Fischer-Barnicol, "Spiegelungen-Vermittlungen" in Erinnerungen an Martin Heidegger, ed. Günther Neske (Pfullingen: Günther Neske, 1977), p. 100: "I remembered that Heidegger had once described Hegel as his 'great adversary'."
- ⁵ Carl Schmitt, Staat, Bewegung, Volk (Hamburg: Hanseatische Verlagsanstalt, 1933), p. 32.
- ⁶ Hegel, Phenomenology of Spirit, trans. A. V. Miller (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977), pp. 18-9.
- ⁷ Heidegger, "Die Negativität. Eine Auseinandersetzung mit Hegel aus dem Ansatz in der Negativität (1938/39, 1941)" in Hegel, ed. Ingrid Schüßler (1993), GA 68, p. 24.
- ⁸ Hegel, Philosophy of Nature: Being Part Two of the Encyclopaedia of the Philosophical Sciences, trans. A. V. Miller (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1970), p. 444.
- ⁹ Ibid., p. 441.
- ¹⁰ Ibid.
- ¹¹ Ibid., p. 36.

- ¹² Ibid., p. 28.
- ¹³ Ibid., p. 34.
- ¹⁴ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 482.
- ¹⁵ Ibid., p. 483.
- ¹⁶ Denise Souche-Dagues, "The dialogue between Heidegger and Hegel" in Heidegger: Critical Assessments, ed. Christopher Macann (London: Routledge, 1992), vol. 2, p. 249.
- ¹⁷ Ibid.
- ¹⁸ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 485.
- ¹⁹ Cf. Jere Paul Surber, "Heidegger's Critique of Hegel's Notion of Time" in Philosophy and Phenomenological Research 39 (1978-9), pp. 358-77. Surber attempts to weaken Heidegger's critique of Hegel's understanding of time by drawing attention to the one-sidedness of any claim about a particular moment in Hegel's system. Yet it is the philosophical basis of the very notion of totality that is at stake in Heidegger's retrieval of transcendence.
- ²⁰ Heidegger, The Concept of Time, trans. William McNeill (Oxford: Blackwell, 1992), p. 21.
- ²¹ Hegel, Philosophy of Nature: Being Part Two of the Encyclopaedia of the Philosophical Sciences, p. 35.
- ²² Heidegger, Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit, trans. Parvis Emad and Kenneth Maly (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994), pp. 38-9.
- ²³ Ibid., p. 100.
- ²⁴ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 56.
- ²⁵ Heidegger, Contributions to Philosophy, p. 188. Translation modified.
- ²⁶ Hegel, Philosophy of Right, trans. T. M. Knox (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1952), p. 10.
- ²⁷ Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, pp. 72-3.
- ²⁸ Johannes Fritsche, Historical Destiny and National Socialism in Heidegger's "Being and Time", p. 196.
- ²⁹ Heidegger, The History of the Concept of Time, trans. Theodore Kisiel (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992), p. 316.
- ³⁰ Heidegger, Being and Time, pp. 306-7.
- ³¹ Ibid., p. 281.
- ³² Ibid., p. 279.
- ³³ Ibid., p. 287.
- ³⁴ Ibid., p. 288.
- ³⁵ Ibid., p. 309.
- ³⁶ Ibid., p. 310.
- ³⁷ Ibid.
- ³⁸ Heidegger, "The Call to the Labor Service", trans. William S. Lewis in The Heidegger Controversy, p. 55.
- ³⁹ Hegel, "Rede zum Antritt des philosophischen Lehramtes an der Universität Berlin" in Vorlesungsmanuskripte II (1816-1831) in Gesammelte Werke (Hamburg: Felix Meiner, 1995), vol. 18, p. 18: "The taciturn essence of the universe does not have in itself any power that could offer resistance to the daring of knowledge; it must open itself up before it, and lay its wealth and its depths before its eyes and deliver itself up to be enjoyed." This eroticisation of epistemology will be further heightened by Kafka and rewritten as a temptation of a nameless Saint Anthony. See the last of the "Reflections on Sin, Suffering, Hope, and the True Way" in Wedding Preparations in the Country, trans. Ernst Kaiser and Eithne Wilkins (London: Secker and Warburg, 1954), p. 53: "There is no need to leave the house. Stay at your table and listen. Don't even listen, just wait. Don't even wait, be completely quiet and alone. The world will offer itself to you to be unmasked, it can't do otherwise, in raptures it will writhe before you."
- ⁴⁰ Hegel, Philosophy of Right, p. 134.
- ⁴¹ Jacques Taminiaux, "Finitude and the Absolute: Remarks on Hegel and Heidegger" in Heidegger: The Man and the Thinker, ed. Thomas Sheehan (Chicago: Precedent, 1981), pp. 187-208.
- ⁴² Hegel, System of Ethical Life and First Philosophy of Spirit, trans. H. S. Harris and T. M. Knox (Albany: SUNY Press, 1979), p. 144.
- ⁴³ Heidegger, "On the Question of Being", trans. William McNeill in Pathmarks, ed. William McNeill (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), p. 311.
- ⁴⁴ Michel Foucault, "A Preface to Transgression" in Language, Counter-Memory, Practice, trans. Donald F. Bouchard and Sherry Simon (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1977), pp. 35-6.

- ⁴⁵ Hegel, Philosophy of Right, p. 155.
- ⁴⁶ Hitler, Mein Kampf, p. 393.
- ⁴⁷ Ernst Cassirer, The Myth of the State (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1974), p. 293.
- ⁴⁸ Hegel, Phenomenology of Spirit, p. 117.
- ⁴⁹ See Montaigne, "That to study philosophy, is to learn to die" in The Essays of Michael, Seigneur de Montaigne, trans. Charles Cotton (London: Ward, Lock, and Tyler, no year given), p. 68: "The premeditation of death is the premeditation of liberty; who has learnt to die has forgot to serve."
- ⁵⁰ Hegel, Phenomenology of Spirit, p. 119.
- ⁵¹ Heidegger, "Overcoming Metaphysics", trans. Joan Stambaugh in The Heidegger Controversy, p. 69.
- ⁵² Cf. Michael E. Zimmerman, Heidegger's Confrontation with Modernity: Technology, Politics and Art (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990), p. xviii: "Heidegger maintained that National Socialism would restore Germany to its authentic origins, thereby making possible a new relationship to work on the part of the German Volk." Zimmerman, however, does not understand the authentic origins of the Volk in the sense of the being-outside-of-itself of originary temporality.
- ⁵³ Heidegger, "Letter from Heidegger to Marcuse of January 20, 1948", trans. Richard Wolin in The Heidegger Controversy, p. 162.
- ⁵⁴ Cf. Karl Jaspers, Notizen zu Martin Heidegger, ed. Hans Saner (Munich: R. Piper, 1978), p. 79. Jaspers decries the irresponsible affirmation of Marxism that he sees in the "Letter on 'Humanism'".
- ⁵⁵ Heidegger, "Letter on 'Humanism'" in Pathmarks, pp. 258-9.
- ⁵⁶ Ibid., p. 259.
- ⁵⁷ Marx, Critique of Hegel's 'Philosophy of Right', trans. Annette Jolin and Joseph O'Malley (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970), pp. 14-5.
- ⁵⁸ Marx and Engels, The German Ideology, trans. S. Ryazanskaya (London: Lawrence & Wishart, 1965), p. 168.
- ⁵⁹ See E. Oldemeyer, "Eher auf Husserl als auf Lukács zielend" in Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 3/3/1988, p. 9.
- ⁶⁰ Lucien Goldmann, Lukács and Heidegger: Towards a New Philosophy, trans. William Q. Boelhower (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1977), p. 13 et passim.
- ⁶¹ Kostas Axelos, Einführung in ein künftiges Denken Über Marx und Heidegger (Tübingen: Max Niemeyer, 1966), p. 17.
- ⁶² Lukács, History and Class Consciousness, trans. Rodney Livingstone (London: Merlin Press, 1971), p. xxxvi.
- ⁶³ Ibid., p. xx.
- ⁶⁴ Ibid., pp. xxiii-iv.
- ⁶⁵ Ibid., pp. xxii-iii.
- ⁶⁶ Ibid., p. xxiv.
- ⁶⁷ Ibid., p. xxiii.
- ⁶⁸ Althusser, For Marx, trans. Ben Brewster (London: Penguin, 1969), p. 222n.
- ⁶⁹ Heidegger, Contributions to Philosophy, p. 224. Translation modified.

II Ontological Opportunism

- ¹ José Ortega y Gasset, The Revolt of the Masses (London: Unwin, 1961), p. 10.
- ² Christopher Fynsk, "But Suppose We Were to Take the Rectorial Address Seriously... Gérard Granel's De l'université" in Graduate Faculty Philosophy Journal 14/15 (1991), pp. 342-3.
- ³ Deleuze and Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus, p. 456.
- ⁴ Goebbels, Goebbels spricht: Reden aus Kampf und Sieg (Oldenburg: Gerhard Stalling, 1933), p. 75.
- ⁵ Heidegger, "The Rectorate 1933/34: Facts and Thoughts" in Martin Heidegger and National Socialism: Questions and Answers, eds. Günther Neske and Emil Kettering, trans. Lisa Harries (New York: Paragon House, 1990), p. 22.
- ⁶ Ibid., p. 23.
- ⁷ Heidegger, "Only a God Can Save Us" in The Heidegger Controversy, p. 95.
- ⁸ Heidegger, "Telegramm an den Reichskanzler", Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 105.

⁹ Heidegger, "The Self-Assertion of the German University", trans. William S. Lewis in The Heidegger Controversy, p.31. Translation modified.

¹⁰ Heidegger, "Nur ein Gott kann uns noch retten" in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 657. This is one of the sentences that, without Heidegger's knowledge, was deleted by the editors of Der Spiegel from the first published version of the interview. See the relevant editorial notes in the Gesamtausgabe

¹¹ See, for instance, the rectoral address of Ernst Krieck, Die Erneuerung der Universität (Frankfurt am Main: H. Bechhold, 1933), p. 11: "Once the barriers between the various sciences have been broken through, from within every specialist question the view would open on the great ideological [weltanschaulich] interconnection of sense, whereby the organic union, the living exchange between all individual disciplines would be produced."

¹² Heidegger, "The Self-Assertion of the German University", p. 38.

¹³ In the notes that Helene Weiss took of Heidegger's 1933 lecture course "Die Grundfragen der Philosophie" (in the as yet unpublished volume 36/37 of the Gesamtausgabe) — and that Farías quotes in Heidegger and Nazism, trans. Paul Burrell and Gabriel R. Ricci (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989), p. 134 — Heidegger is reported to have declared that if there was at the time any threat of a relapse into barbarism, it stemmed not from National Socialism, but rather from those who, out of adherence to a shallow notion of science, refused to go along with the revolution. Although such a passage certainly expresses a commitment to the politicisation of science, what that politicisation might mean for Heidegger is arguably not to be ascertained from the protocols of the NSDAP.

¹⁴ Heidegger, "The Self-Assertion of the German University", p. 35.

¹⁵ Ibid., p. 30.

¹⁶ Heidegger, Einleitung in die Philosophie, eds. Otto Saame and Ina Saame-Speidel (1996), GA 27, pp. 7-8.

¹⁷ Heidegger, "Erläuterungen und Grundsätzliches" in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, pp. 410-1.

¹⁸ Heidegger, "The Self-Assertion of the German University", p. 37.

¹⁹ Heidegger, What Is A Thing?, trans. W. B. Barton, Jr. and Vera Deutsch (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1967), p. 150.

²⁰ See, for example, Ludwig Bieberbach, Die völkische Verwurzelung der Wissenschaft (Typen mathematischen Schaffens) (Heidelberg: Kommissionsverlag der Weiß'schen Universitätsbuchhandlung, 1940). For Bieberbach, the theories of various modern mathematicians can be seen to betray the race of the exponent and simultaneously their profundity or artificiality.

²¹ Heidegger, "Ansprache am 11. November in Leipzig" in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 191.

²² Heidegger, Logik als die Frage nach dem Wesen der Sprache, p. 122.

²³ Heidegger, "Erläuterungen und Grundsätzliches" in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 414.

²⁴ Heidegger, "As When On a Holiday..." in Elucidations of Hölderlin's Poetry, p. 86.

²⁵ Ibid., p. 83.

²⁶ Ibid., p. 93. Translation modified.

²⁷ Ibid. Translation modified.

²⁸ Compare the lecture "The Thing" from 1950, with its meditation on the void of the intact jug, with the rag-and-bone man's fascination for broken equipment in Being and Time.

²⁹ Clemens August Hoberg, Das Dasein des Menschen: Die Grundfrage der Heideggerschen Philosophie (Zeulenroda: Bernhard Sporn, 1937), p. 8.

³⁰ Ibid., p. 90.

³¹ Ibid.

³² See Heidegger's private expressions of shame in his letters to Jaspers of March 7 and April 8 1950 in Martin Heidegger and Karl Jaspers, Briefwechsel 1920-63, ed. Walter Biemel and Hans Saner (Frankfurt am Main, Munich and Zürich: Vittorio Klostermann and Piper, 1990), pp. 196 et 201.

³³ If in T. E. Lawrence's flirtation with fascism, to cite an example of an engagement aborted at least by circumstances, the movement arguably succeeds to a pre-ordained function in the machinery of a claustrophobic, yet unshakable subjectivism, it is because the machinery as a whole was already fascist, albeit not so much in the sense of the movement itself as of the grounds of its popularity. For a clear statement of the Byronism that he shared with many writers in defeated Germany, see T. E. Lawrence, The Seven Pillars of Wisdom (London: Jonathan Cape, 1926), p. 325: "There could be no honour in a sure success, but much might be wrested from a sure defeat. Omnipotence and the Infinite were our two worthiest foemen, indeed the only ones for a full man to meet, they being monsters of his own spirit's making; and the stoutest enemies were always of the household. In fighting Omnipotence, honour was proudly to throw away the poor resources that we had, and dare Him empty-handed; to be beaten, not merely by more mind, but by its advantage of better tools. To the clear-sighted, failure was the only goal. We must believe, through and through, that there was no victory, except to go down into death fighting and crying for failure itself, calling in excess of despair to Omnipotence to strike harder, that by His very striking He might temper our tortured selves into the weapon of His own ruin."

³⁴ Heidegger, An Introduction to Metaphysics, p. 103.

³⁵ Acknowledging Heidegger's reservations towards pre-classical Greece, Reiner Schürmann in Heidegger on Being and Acting: From Principles to Anarchy, trans. Christine-Marie Gros (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990) curiously sees therein his distance from the German Romantics. In what way were the Romantics intent on "reviving experiences inspired by pre-classical Greece" (p. 218)? Schürmann does not elaborate. Indeed the most obvious example of a work inspired by pre-classical Greece, Kleist's Penthesilea, invokes the heroic age in order to subject its notion of glory to the Romantic figure of the secret.

³⁶ Aristotle, Politics, trans. H. Rackham (London: William Heinemann, 1932), 1253.

³⁷ Deleuze and Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus, p. 230.

³⁸ Ibid., p. 214-5.

³⁹ Therefore, however much the regime aided and abetted its own dissolution, it could not otherwise be further removed from those revolutions by connivance in which the chieftains of Tupi-Guarani society are relieved of a power that has grown excessive. See Pierre Clastres' account of how the karai, the prophets of the Tupi-Guarani, would unify the tribes against the threat of an entrenchment of the power of the chiefs in Society against the State, trans. Robert Hurley (New York: Urizen, 1977), p. 185: "They [the karai] managed to carry out the whole 'program' of the chiefs with a single stroke."

⁴⁰ On the early wastefulness of the Wehrwirtschaft even as an economy of waste, see Hermann Rauschning, Germany's Revolution of Destruction, trans. E. W. Dicks (London: William Heinemann, 1939), p. 141: "As a matter of fact, during this first stage of necessarily precipitate arming a great deal of material was used up to no purpose."

⁴¹ Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 51.

⁴² Heidegger, "The Origin of the Work of Art", trans. Albert Hofstadter in Basic Writings, ed. David Farrell Krell (San Francisco: Harper, 1993), p. 186.

⁴³ Heidegger, Vom Wesen der Wahrheit: Zu Platons Höhlengleichnis und Theätet, ed. Hermann Mörchen (1988) GA 34, p. 143.

⁴⁴ Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymn "The Ister", trans. William McNeill and Julia Davis (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996), p. 72.

⁴⁵ Heidegger, "On the Essence of Truth", trans. John Sallis in Pathmarks, ed. William McNeill (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), p. 140.

⁴⁶ Ibid., p. 141.

⁴⁷ Ibid., p. 142.

⁴⁸ Ibid., pp. 143-4.

⁴⁹ Ibid., pp. 145-6.

⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 147-8.

⁵¹ Cf. John Bailiff, "Truth and Power: Martin Heidegger, 'The Essence of Truth' and 'The Self-Assertion of the German University'" in Man and World 20 (1987), pp. 327-36. Bailiff, who sees in "The Essence of Truth" nothing more than an equilibrium between the concealed and the unconcealed, refuses to error — and thus to the defiance of concealment in the rectoral address — its role in an ontological understanding of Dasein.

⁵² Lacoue-Labarthe, "Transcendence Ends in Politics" in Typography: Mimesis, Philosophy, Politics, ed. Christopher Fynsk (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989), p. 287.

⁵³ Heidegger, "The Self-Assertion of the German University", pp. 38-9.

III The Feast

¹ The first of the five quotations from Hölderlin that Heidegger discusses in the lecture “Hölderlin and the Essence of Poetry” in Elucidations of Hölderlin’s Poetry, p. 51.

² Heidegger, “Only a God Can Save Us” in The Heidegger Controversy: A Critical Reader, p. 101.

³ Heidegger, “Letter to the Rector of Freiburg University, November 4, 1945”, trans. Richard Wolin in The Heidegger Controversy, p. 65.

⁴ Heidegger, Hölderlin’s Hymne »Andenken«, p. 78.

⁵ Heidegger, Schelling Vom Wesen der menschlichen Freiheit (1809), ed. Ingrid Schüßler (1988), GA 42, p. 40.

⁶ Cf. Werner Marx, “Thinking and Its Matter” in Heidegger Memorial Lectures, ed. Werner Marx, trans. Steven W. Davis (Pittsburgh: Duquesne University, 1982), pp. 52-4. Marx, in a discussion of the notion of errancy in the lecture “On the Essence of Truth”, proposes a similar reservation before judgements that are either for or against Heidegger: the unquestioned and undefended mutual exclusiveness of these judgements is an expression of indifference toward Heidegger’s project.

⁷ Heidegger, Hölderlin’s Hymn “The Ister”, pp. 54-5.

⁸ Heidegger, Hölderlin’s Hymne »Andenken«, p. 134.

⁹ Heidegger, Hölderlin’s Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 17.

¹⁰ Heidegger, Nietzsche. Europäischer Nihilismus, ed. Petra Jaeger (1986), GA 48, p. 333.

¹¹ Heidegger, “Der Anfang des Abendländischen Denkens. Heraklit” in Heraklit, ed. Manfred S. Frings (1979), GA 55, p. 83.

¹² Heidegger, An Introduction to Metaphysics, p. 203. Translation modified.

¹³ Nietzsche, The Will to Power, trans. Walter Kaufmann and R. J. Hollingdale (New York: Vintage Books, 1968), p. 17.

¹⁴ Heidegger, Heraklit, p. 123.

¹⁵ Ibid., pp. 180-1.

¹⁶ Heidegger, “Overcoming Metaphysics”, trans. Joan Stambaugh in The Heidegger Controversy: A Critical Reader, p. 82-3. Translation modified.

¹⁷ Heidegger, What Is Called Thinking?, trans. J. Glenn Gray (New York: Harper & Row, 1968), p. 66.

¹⁸ Heidegger, “Overcoming Metaphysics” in The Heidegger Controversy, pp. 84-5.

¹⁹ Heidegger, Hölderlin’s Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 220.

²⁰ Heidegger, Nietzsche, trans. David Farrell Krell (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1979), vol. 1, p. 74.

²¹ Ibid., p. 159.

²² Ibid., p. 160.

²³ Heidegger, “The Origin of the Work of Art”, trans. Albert Hofstadter in Basic Writings, ed. David Farrell Krell (San Francisco: Harper, 1993), p. 170.

²⁴ Ibid., p. 161.

²⁵ Ibid., p. 161.

²⁶ Ibid., p. 159.

²⁷ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 99.

²⁸ Ibid., p. 97.

²⁹ Ibid., pp. 102-3.

³⁰ Heidegger, Die Metaphysik des deutschen Idealismus, ed. Günter Seubold (1991), GA 49, p. 44.

³¹ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 105.

³² Heidegger, “The Origin of the Work of Art”, p. 162.

³³ Cf. Derrida, The Truth in Painting, trans. Geoff Bennington and Ian McLeod (Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1987), p. 318 et seq. Derrida argues that Heidegger cannot without contradiction claim to see a pair of peasant’s shoes when he “confirms fully that his project was to go beyond the picture as representation.” (p. 321)

³³ For Samuel IJsseling, in “Mimesis and Translation” in Reading Heidegger: Commemorations, ed. John

Sallis (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993), pp. 348-51, Heidegger's exposition, in the Nietzsche lectures, of Plato's thinking of mimesis is traditional. This fidelity, however, is indispensable to the destruction.

³⁵ Plato, The Republic in The Dialogues of Plato, trans. B. Jowett (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1953), vol. 2, p. 470.

³⁶ Heidegger, Nietzsche, vol. 1, p. 185.

³⁷ Lacoue-Labarthe discusses this agreement as it relates to Heidegger's enquiry into the essence of truth in his readings of Hölderlin. See Lacoue-Labarthe, "The Caesura of the Speculative" in Typography: Mimesis, Philosophy, Politics, ed. Christopher Fynsk (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989), p. 231: "It is true that Heidegger constantly sought in Hölderlin the possibility of backing up from the assumption in the speculative mode of adaequatio and of 'exiting' from within the onto-theo-logic. This is why the "logic" of aletheia can also be inscribed as the "logic" of Ent-fernung [é-loignement or "(dis)distancing"]. But who knows whether this "logic" itself (including, too, what ceaselessly carries it off in its most demanding moments) is not also penetrated throughout by (if not subject to) mimetology?" The implication of this logic within mimetology is not pursued by Lacoue-Labarthe to its ground within Heidegger's own thinking.

³⁸ Heidegger, Nietzsche, vol. 1, p. 186.

³⁹ Heidegger, The Principle of Reason, trans. Reginald Lilly (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991), p. 34.

⁴⁰ Quoting the passage from The Principle of Reason, Gottfried Boehm discusses in his essay, "Im Horizont der Zeit. Heideggers Werkbegriff und die Kunst der Moderne" in Kunst und Technik: Gedächtnisschrift zum 100. Geburtstag von Martin Heidegger, eds. Walter Biemel and Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (Frankfurt am Main: Klostermann, 1989), the paintings of Mondrian and Tobey and disputes whether Heidegger does not mistake the nature of their art (pp. 279-84). The apparent conservatism of Heidegger's position derives from his adherence to Plato's definition of art: Boehm's genuine obscurantism is manifest in his assumption of the self-evidence of his definition of art for which Mondrian and Tobey are presented as illustrations and the de facto delimitations.

⁴¹ For an objection, which is itself a review of the objections, to Heidegger's readings of Plato's meditations on the essence of truth, see Robert J. Dostal, "Beyond being: Heidegger's Plato" in Martin Heidegger Critical Assessments, ed. Christopher Macann (London: Routledge, 1992), vol. 2, pp. 61 – 89. Dostal notes Heidegger's neglect of the Good (Plato's idea tou agathou) in his treatment of the cave allegory. The Good, that which is beyond beings (epekeina tes ousias) and illuminates them, is the precondition of adequation and as such the constitutive Un-thought of theories of knowledge. Yet, however much the distortions and oversights in Heidegger's readings of both Plato and Nietzsche count against them as strict exegeses of philosophical texts, the problem of presence that they help to delineate, and that elucidates the conception of the political shared by National Socialism and its military opponents, retains its status.

⁴² Heidegger, "Plato's Doctrine of Truth", trans. Thomas Sheehan in Pathmarks, p. 164.

⁴³ Ibid., p. 173.

⁴⁴ Heidegger, Plato's Sophist, trans. Richard Rojcewicz and André Schuwer (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997), p. 440.

⁴⁵ Heidegger, "Plato's Doctrine of Truth", p. 177.

⁴⁶ Ibid., p. 179.

⁴⁷ Ibid., p. 174.

⁴⁸ Heidegger in this respect is closer to Kant than to Nietzsche. In the Critique of Judgement Kant rediscovers in beauty the irreducibility to presence that Plato delineates in mimesis. In §15 of the "Analytic of the Beautiful", beauty is set forth as a matter of feeling rather than of an object's conformity to its concept (its usefulness or its perfection). The beautiful is, as it were, that which appears without being present because it appears without the ideā of Platonism.

⁴⁹ Cf. John Sallis, Echoes. After Heidegger (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990), p. 33n. Sallis proposes mimesis as a definition of that which in Kant and the Problem of Metaphysics is discussed as "repetition". Mimesis would thus be the repetition that discloses the Un-thought of that which is repeated (Heidegger's thinking of mimesis is to be traced to his own hermeneutic practice).

⁵⁰ Heidegger, "The Origin of the Work of Art", pp. 204-5. Translation modified.

⁵¹ Alfons Grieder in his essay "What did Heidegger mean by 'Essence'?", included in Martin Heidegger Critical Assessments, ed. Christopher Macann (London: Routledge, 1992), vol. 1, pp. 183-212, backs away from Heidegger's statements on the grounding of the world in the work of art, and specifically in van Gogh's painting, and prefers to interpret the work of art as offering essential insight into pre-existing worlds. Grieder thereby reinstalls notions of the thing, the world and the subject to whose destruction Heidegger dedicates much of his critical acumen.

⁵² Plato, The Symposium, trans. W. Hamilton (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1951), p. 85.

⁵³ Heidegger, "The Origin of the Work of Art" in Basic Writings, p. 184.

⁵⁴ Heidegger, Metaphysik und Nihilismus, ed. Hans-Joachim Friedrich (1999), GA 67, p. 108.

⁵⁵ Heidegger, "The Origin of the Work of Art" in Basic Writings, p. 197.

⁵⁶ Heidegger, "Hölderlin and the Essence of Poetry" in Elucidations of Hölderlin's Poetry, p. 55-6.

⁵⁷ Heidegger, "Letter on 'Humanism'", trans. Frank A. Capuzzi in Pathmarks, p. 243.

⁵⁸ Heidegger, "Hölderlin and the Essence of Poetry" in Elucidations of Hölderlin's Poetry, p. 60.

⁵⁹ Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 33.

⁶⁰ Heidegger, Basic Concepts, trans. Gary E. Aylesworth (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993), p. 32.

⁶¹ Ibid., p. 34.

⁶² Cf. Julian Young, Heidegger Philosophy Nazism (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997), pp. 11-51. Young, in an apology for what he considers to be the greatness of Heidegger's philosophy, does not allow for this aspect of elaboration in Heidegger's critique of metaphysics, discussing and dismissing his "anti-modernism" as a simple reiteration of certain long-standing propositions of German nationalism.

⁶³ See Wilhelm von Schramm, "Schöpferische Kritik des Krieges" in Krieg und Krieger, ed. Ernst Jünger (Berlin: Junker und Dünhaupt, 1930), pp. 31-49.

⁶⁴ For an account of the similarly non-nostalgic, yet pro-technological conservatism that was exploited by the Nazis in reconciling modernisation with German nationalism, see Jeffrey Herf, Reactionary modernism: Technology, culture, and politics in Weimar and the Third Reich (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984).

⁶⁵ Heidegger, "Abendgespräch in einem Kriegsgefangenenlager in Rußland zwischen einem Jüngeren und einem Älteren" in Feldweg-Gespräche (1944/45), ed. Ingrid Schüßler (1995), GA 77, pp. 232-3.

⁶⁶ Ibid., p. 234.

⁶⁷ Cf. Deleuze and Guattari, Kafka: Toward a Minor Literature, trans. Dana Polan (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1986), p. 98n where they discern in Hölderlin an art of waiting as a defence against contiguity.

⁶⁸ Heidegger, "Die gegenwärtige Lage und die künftige Aufgabe der deutschen Philosophie" in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, p. 324.

⁶⁹ Habermas, "Work and Weltanschauung: The Heidegger Controversy from a German Perspective", trans. John McCumber in Critical Inquiry 15 (1989), p. 445.

⁷⁰ See Hitler's remarks to Speer on the "justice" of the German defeat as quoted in Alan Bullock, Hitler: A Study in Tyranny (London: Odhams Press, 1952), p. 707. Once Germany had been thwarted in its imperialist aspirations, Hitler's reverence for strength — as that which realises the universal — led him to acknowledge Russia's superiority.

⁷¹ Hannah Arendt treats the distinction between oikos and polis historically and philosophically in The Human Condition (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1958), pp. 28-37.

⁷² Heidegger, An Introduction to Metaphysics, pp. 152-3. Translation modified.

⁷³ Max Kommerell, Der Dichter als Führer in der deutschen Klassik (Frankfurt am Main: Vittorio Klostermann, 1942), p. 474.

⁷⁴ Heidegger, Besinnung, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1997), GA 66, p. 37.

⁷⁵ Ibid., pp. 190-1.

⁷⁶ Hölderlin, "The Significance of Tragedies" in Essays and Letters on Theory, trans. Thomas Pfau (Albany: SUNY Press, 1988), p. 89.

⁷⁷ Hölderlin, "Remarks on 'Oedipus'" in Essays and Letters on Theory, pp. 101-2.

⁷⁸ Heidegger, Vom Wesen der Wahrheit: Zu Platons Höhlengleichnis und Theätet, ed. Hermann Mörchlen (1988), GA 34, p. 64.

⁷⁹ See the recollection in the foreword to the first edition of his Frühe Schriften in Heidegger, Frühe Schriften, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann, GA 1, 1978, p. 56.

⁸⁰ Walter Benjamin, "Two Poems by Friedrich Hölderlin" in Selected Writings, eds. Marcus Bullock and Michael W. Jennings (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1996), vol. 1, p. 34.

⁸¹ Hölderlin, Poems and Fragments, trans. Michael Hamburger (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1966), p. 407.

⁸² Heidegger, Hölderlins Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 100.

⁸³ That Heidegger was writing in such terms in 1934-5 contradicts Richard Wolin's thesis in The Politics of Being: The Political Thought of Martin Heidegger (New York: Columbia University Press, 1990) that only with the beginning of the lectures on Nietzsche does Heidegger distance himself from his engagement with National Socialism: Heidegger's definitions of the priest and the leader, the poet and the thinker clearly do not lend themselves to conventional understandings of authoritarianism.

⁸⁴ The coherence between Heidegger's account of the revelation of world in the experience of broken, missing and inappropriate equipment and his definition of the world-historical mission of the Germans in the encounter with τεχνή is obscured by Hubert L. Dreyfus in his identification of world with cultural practices. What could other peoples be expected to gain from an insight into the unarticulated know-how of being German? That world, for Heidegger, is not cosmopolitan does not at all imply that it is to be equated with a Weltanschauung. The differentiability of world does not resolve into different worlds, each standing apart from the others. World is not unitary and therefore not cosmopolitan, because it can only truly be world as the Being that in its transcendence is still higher than the Aristotelian One and its presence. Cf. Hubert L. Dreyfus, "Heidegger on the connection between nihilism, art, technology, and politics" in The Cambridge Companion to Heidegger, ed. Charles Guignon (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993), p. 295: "It would make no sense for us, who are active, independent, and aggressive — constantly striving to cultivate and satisfy our desires — to relate to things the way the Japanese do; or for the Japanese (before their understanding of being was interfered with by ours) to invent and prefer Styrofoam teacups." Is not the fact of interference proof that the Japanese understanding of being was always already open to the questionableness of its "own" unity? Heidegger explicitly discusses the questionableness of the unity of the worlds of various peoples when he elaborates Hölderlin's account of the constitutive and vertiginous interrelations between Greece and Germany. Even if chronologically Heidegger figures in intellectual histories between Oswald Spengler and Thomas S. Kuhn, his thinking is poorly expounded so long as its radical difference from talk of the souls of cultures and paradigms is underplayed.

⁸⁵ Heidegger, Hölderlins Hymne »Andenken«, p. 74.

⁸⁶ Ibid., p. 75.

⁸⁷ Ibid., p. 113.

⁸⁸ Ibid., p. 66.

⁸⁹ Kafka, "Josephine the Singer, or the Mouse Folk", trans. Willa and Edwin Muir in The Complete Stories, ed. Nahum N. Glatzer (New York: Schocken, 1972), p. 370.

⁹⁰ Ibid., p. 367-8.

⁹¹ Heidegger, Hölderlins Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 290.

IV Towards the Uncanny Homeland

¹ Hegel, Early Theological Writings, trans. T. M. Knox (Gloucester: Peter Smith, 1970), p. 145.

² Cf. Marlène Zarader, La dette impensée: Heidegger et l'héritage hébraïque (Paris: Seuil, 1990), pp. 213-4: "What, therefore, seems to me objectionable in the Heideggerian text is not that the Hebraic component is passed over in silence (one could indeed admit that this silence is legitimate), but rather that it returns without ever being identified, that it returns in a text that does everything to render the identification impossible." Zarader, who takes up Paul Ricoeur's questions to Heidegger at Cerisy on the Hebraic tradition, notes an interdiction on the proper name of the Hebraic in Heidegger but does not properly consider the Hebraic legitimacy of this interdiction.

³ Lyotard, Heidegger and "the jews", trans. Andreas Michel and Mark S. Roberts (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1990), p. 29.

⁴ Cf. Friedrich Franz von Unruh, Friedrich Hölderlin (Stuttgart: Georg Trunkenmüller, 1942), p. 6: "The longing, which — peculiarly enough — for a millennium beheld the 'Holy Land' in the exotic, finds its way home." Unruh sees solely an opposition to Judaea in Hölderlin's presentation of Germany as the Holy Land. That, through its substitution for the Holy Land, Germany can, indeed, break with Judaea is never doubted.

⁵ Heidegger, Hölderlins Hymne »Andenken«, pp. 134-5.

⁶ Heidegger, Grundfragen der Philosophie, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1984), GA 45, p. 5.

⁷ Franz Rosenzweig, The Star of Redemption, trans. William W. Hallo (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971), p. 300.

⁸ Alfred Rosenberg, Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts (München: Hoheneichen, 1934), p. 426.

⁹ Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymn "The Ister", pp. 79-80.

¹⁰ Ibid., pp. 80-1.

¹¹ Ibid., p. 82.

¹² Ibid., p. 82..

¹³ Heidegger, Parmenides, p. 90.

¹⁴ Hölderlin, Sämtliche Werke, ed. Friedrich Beissner (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1946-), vol. 2,1, p. 228.

¹⁵ Heidegger, Hölderlins Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 121.

¹⁶ Cf. David Farrell Krell, Daimon Life: Heidegger and life-philosophy (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, c1992), p. 179: "Heidegger's nationalism [...] will escape unscathed the rigors to which Heidegger almost everywhere else subjects his heritage."

¹⁷ Heidegger, Being and Time, pp. 143-4.

¹⁸ Cf. Hubert L. Dreyfus, Being-in-the-world (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1991), p. 137. Dreyfus mistakes the nature of Heidegger's correction, believing that Heidegger merely shifts the focus from the body to the accessibility of equipment.

¹⁹ Kant, "What is Orientation in Thinking?" in Political Writings, trans. H. B. Nisbet (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991), p. 238.

²⁰ Hegel, The History of Philosophy, trans. E. S. Haldane and Frances H. Simson (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1955), vol. 3, p. 216.

²¹ Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, A 26 B 42.

²² Heidegger, History of the Concept of Time, p. 230.

²³ Kant, Logic, trans. Robert S. Hartman and Wolfgang Schwarz (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1974), p. 29.

²⁴ Heidegger, Contributions to Philosophy, p. 49.

²⁵ For an exposition of his concept of Lebensraum, see Hitler's speech of 15 February 1942 in »Es spricht der Führer«: 7 exemplarische Hitler-Reden, eds. Hildegard von Kotze and Helmut Krausnick (Gütersloh: Signert Mohn, 1966), pp. 305-28.

²⁶ Susanne Ziegler, Heidegger, Hölderlin und die αληθεια: Martin Heideggers Geschichtsdenken in seinen Vorlesungen 1934/35 bis 1944 (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1991), p. 385.

²⁷ Hölderlin, "Selected Letters. No. 236. To Casimir Ulrich Böhlendorff" in Essays and Letters on Theory, trans. Thomas Pfau (Albany: SUNY Press, 1988), pp. 149-50.

²⁸ Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymn "The Ister", p. 136.

²⁹ Heidegger, Hölderlins Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 220.

³⁰ Annemarie Gethmann-Siefert, in "Heidegger and Hölderlin: the over-usage of 'Poets in an impoverished time'", trans. Richard Taft in Martin Heidegger: Critical Assessments, ed. Christopher Macann (London: Routledge, 1992), vol. 3, remarkably hears nothing of the "querelle des anciens et des modernes" in Heidegger's readings of Hölderlin. See p. 257: "[Heidegger] transplants Hölderlin's poetry into a situation in which the difference between the ancient and the modern which was codiagnosed by the poet himself does not arise." Having formulated the difference between the ancient and the modern as that between "aesthetic religion and the requirements of reason articulated in the ideal of educating a people", Gethmann-Siefert refuses any other formulation.

³¹ Hölderlin, "The Perspective from which We Have to Look at Antiquity" in Essays and Letters on Theory, p. 39.

³² Hölderlin, "Selected Letters. No. 240. To Casimir Ulrich Böhlendorff" in Essays and Letters on Theory, p. 152.

³³ Wilhelm Michel, Hölderlins Abendländische Wendung (Weimar: Feuer, 1922), p. 7.

³⁴ Against reading place in Hölderlin's poetry geographically Heidegger cautions in "Das abendländische Gespräch" in Zu Hölderlin. Griechenlandreisen, ed. Curt Ochwadt (2000), GA 75, p. 79.

³⁵ Heidegger, "Hölderlin and the Essence of Poetry" in Elucidations of Hölderlin's Poetry, p. 64.

³⁶ Heidegger, Hölderlin's Hymns »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, GA 39, p. 214.

³⁷ Jean-Luc Nancy, The Birth to Presence, trans. Brian Holmes and others (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1993), p. 104.

³⁸ Heidegger, Logik als die Frage nach dem Wesen der Sprache, p. 69.

³⁹ Ibid., p. 83.

⁴⁰ Ibid., p. 69.

⁴¹ Ibid., p. 77.

⁴² Ibid., p. 70.

⁴³ Freud, "The 'Uncanny'" in The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, ed. James Strachey (London: The Hogarth Press, 1953-75), vol. 17, pp. 220-1.

⁴⁴ Ibid., p. 226.

⁴⁵ Ibid., p. 245.

⁴⁶ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 233. Translation modified.

⁴⁷ Ibid., p. 230.

⁴⁸ Ibid., p. 234.

⁴⁹ Ibid., p. 231.

⁵⁰ Ibid., p. 234.

⁵¹ Ibid., p. 231.

⁵² Heidegger, "Der Ursprung des Kunstwerkes" in Holzwege, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1977), GA 5, p. 41.

⁵³ The essential unavailability of the fatherland, as it is experienced in Angst, is ignored by John D. Caputo in his reading of the Jewish influence in Heidegger's notion of Heimat. See Caputo, "People of God, people of being: the theological presuppositions of Heidegger's path of thought" in Appropriating Heidegger, ed. James E. Faulconer and Mark A. Wrathall (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000), p. 99: "We need to break with the deeply hierarchical logic of original and derivative, with the myth of the originary language, the originary people, the original land, by means of which Heidegger reproduces the myth of God's chosen people, of God's promised land, which is no less a problem for religion and the root of its violence. We need to break the logic that allows the myth to flourish that certain human beings speak the language that being or God would speak, had they vocal chords and lungs and writing instruments, the murderous twin myths of the people of God and of the people of being, myths which license murder in the name of God or in the name of the question of being." For Caputo, what is at issue is not a resemblance between the effort to think Being as such and the Hebraic prohibition on images, but a criticism of both Nazi Germany and the modern state of Israel.

⁵⁴ Luce Irigaray, The forgetting of air in Martin Heidegger, trans. Mary Beth Mader (London: Athlone Press, 1999), p. 166.

⁵⁵ It is thus with an unavowed irony that Irigaray writes of Heidegger and alterity: "Of the reduction to nothingness that he put in place between the other and himself so as to return to an other that is already produced by him. That is already ensnared in his world." (p. 98) This is the same irony that a few years later appears in Lyotard's thinking of "the jews" as the "..." of primal repression. Irigaray, unlike Heidegger, knows the name of the Other and thereby exposes herself to the irony of "crossing the line" without truly leaving classical ontology.

⁵⁶ Heidegger, "Homecoming/To Kindred Ones" in Elucidations of Hölderlin's Poetry, p. 42.

⁵⁷ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 234.

⁵⁸ Cf. Emil Kettering, Nähe: Das Denken Martin Heideggers (Pfullingen: Neske, 1987), p. 201: "Not-being-at-home is not simply the fortuitously given starting point that is to be left behind as quickly as possible and that for itself is without foundation. Instead, the experience of not-being-at-home is constitutive for becoming-at-home. Only the conscious appropriation of not-being-at-home renders becoming-at-home possible." Kettering is led astray by the occasional Hegelian reminiscence in Heidegger's exposition to a valorization of consciousness. Dasein does not become at home through becoming conscious that it is not at home. On the contrary, it becomes (always already) at home through the consternation of that which, as its being at home in the ontic, is named "consciousness".

⁵⁹ Such an interpretation does not need to be read as a reminiscence of Hegel's absolute negativity, contrary to the suggestion of Will McNeill in "Heimat: Heidegger on the Threshold" in Heidegger toward the Turn: Essays on the Work of the 1930s, ed. James Risser (Albany: SUNY Press, 1999). Heidegger's nothingness is not the negativity that "sanctions the infinite self-appropriation of spirit" (p. 343), since it is a nothingness that has been defined by its transcendence of the presence in which such self-appropriation takes place.

⁶⁰ Heidegger, "Sprache und Heimat" in Aus der Erfahrung des Denkens, ed. Hermann Heidegger (1983), GA 13, pp. 156-7.

⁶¹ Ibid., p. 155.

⁶² Adorno, "Parataxis" in Notes to Literature, trans. Shierry Weber Nicholson (New York: Columbia University Press, 1992), p. 117.

⁶³ Ibid., p. 117.

⁶⁴ Nietzsche, "Antwort", in Werke: Kritische Ausgabe, ed. Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1967-), vol. VII, 3, p. 38.

⁶⁵ Heidegger, 1. Nietzsches Metaphysik 2. Einleitung in die Philosophie: Dichten und Denken, ed. Petra Jaeger (1990), GA 50, p. 124.

⁶⁶ Martin Heidegger and Erhart Kästner, Briefwechsel, ed. Heinrich W. Petzet (Frankfurt am Main: Insel, 1986), p. 59.

⁶⁷ Hölderlin's assessment of the transnationality of Greek art recalls Goethe's remarks to Eckermann on 31/1/1827, but, needless to say, omits Goethe's endorsement of world literature. See Eckermann, Conversations with Goethe, trans. John Oxenford (London: J. M. Dent & Sons, 1930), pp. 165-6.

⁶⁸ When in her text "Heidegger's Philosophy of Art" in Heidegger: The Man and the Thinker, ed. Thomas Sheehan (Chicago: Precedent, 1981), Sandra Lee Bartky treats the notion of "earth" in "The Origin of the Work of Art", she interprets it as the material medium: "Here that pervasive obscurity which is so prominent a feature of Heidegger's style [...] tends to disguise the vacuousness of what is expressed." (p. 264) But the vacuousness here attributed to the notion of the material medium of the work of art is the vacuousness of that which is merely imagined to be self-evident. The non-Greek who is born for art takes to the material medium whose strict formlessness is its invisibility, its concealment in that which Heidegger names "the earth". The formlessness of the material medium is the Nothing: to give form to the material medium, to found a realm of art is to work against the Nothing, to neglect the concealment of the national and to think truth as presence — in short, it is to be Greek. Heidegger's opposition of "earth" and "world" in "The Origin of the Work of Art", contrary to Bartky, has to be understood in relation to the dilemma of the exposition of the ontological difference. World, as the presencing of Being in that which is present is to be "corrected" in its slide towards presence by earth, as the absence of Being from beings, which in its turn has to be "corrected" in its simple inversion of presence.

⁶⁹ Peter Szondi, Hölderlin-Studien. Mit einem Traktat über philologische Erkenntnis (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1970), p. 97.

⁷⁰ On the living force's stance towards art as it is discussed in Hölderlin's essay, compare Andres Thomasberger, Hölderlin Jahrbuch 24 (1984-85), p. 194: "Hölderlin's own conclusion from these reflections can be read crucially in his poetic language, which develops precisely its uniqueness within the 'substantial concord of variations' with existing linguistic forms." The quandary in which Hölderlin as a poet finds himself — either the indiscernible originality of silence or the epigonism of production — and which he relates in the text "The Perspective from which We Have to Look at Antiquity", is interpreted by Thomasberger as though it were an argument and furnished with a conclusion at which it does not arrive. Hölderlin is thereby forcibly claimed for the history of art, namely for that which his text puts in question.

⁷¹ Hegel, Aesthetics, trans. T. M. Knox (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975), pp. 290-1.

⁷² Hölderlin, "On the Operations of the Poetic Spirit" in Essays and Letters on Theory, p. 80.

⁷³ Ibid., p. 107.

⁷⁴ Hölderlin, Hyperion, or The Hermit in Greece, trans. Willard R. Trask in "Hyperion" and Selected Poems, ed. Eric L. Santner (New York: Continuum, 1990), p. 67.

⁷⁵ Cf. Ulrich Gaier, "Hölderlins vaterländische Sangart" in Hölderlin-Jahrbuch 25 (1986-1987), p. 46: "In this respect, Hölderlin's poetry is nationalistic (vaterländisch) regarding the Kingdom of God, the most encompassing of all conceivable spheres." Gaier aims to distance the "national" from the chauvinistic, but he thereby renounces any understanding of that which in Christianity is irreducible to the universal and which as such meets up in its incommensurability with a nationalism too extreme to trouble itself with the cosmopolitanism of hierarchization practised by chauvinism.

⁷⁶ Heidegger, Hölderlins Hymne »Andenken«, p. 141.

⁷⁷ Hölderlin, Poems and Fragments, trans. Michael Hamburger (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1966), p. 519.

⁷⁸ Ibid., p. 449.

⁷⁹ Ibid., p. 451.

⁸⁰ Ibid., p. 453.

⁸¹ Ibid., p. 459.

⁸² Hegel, Aesthetics, pp. 509-10.

⁸³ See Max Horkheimer and Theodor W. Adorno, Dialectics of Enlightenment, trans. John Cumming (London: Verso, 1979), p. 172.

⁸⁴ Cf. Wolfgang Binder, "Sinn und Gestalt der Heimat in Hölderlins Dichtung" in Hölderlin-Jahrbuch 8 (1954), p. 48: "The homeland is for him not at all a motif in this sense, i.e. an item of poetic stage scenery that can be deployed here equally well as there. On the contrary, it is, as has already been said, a living experience of which it can, in certain places, become a necessity to speak." Binder, who rightly sees in the provincialism of Pietism a reaction against the cosmopolitanism of rationalism, does not suspect that it is as a poet, and hence within an understanding of the cosmopolitanism of art, that Hölderlin returns to the Pietism of his background.

⁸⁵ Heidegger, Heraklit, p. 31.

⁸⁶ Hölderlin, Poems and Fragments, p. 537.

⁸⁷ Heidegger, Hölderlins Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, p. 4.

⁸⁸ Lev Shestov, Athens and Jerusalem, trans. Bernard Martin (Athens: Ohio University Press, 1966).

⁸⁹ Derrida, "Violence and Metaphysics: An Essay on the Thought of Emmanuel Lévinas" in Writing and Difference, trans. Alan Bass (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978), p. 153.

⁹⁰ Klopstock, "Der Hügel und der Hain" in Klopstocks Werke, ed. R. Hamel (Berlin and Stuttgart: W. Spemann, no year given), vol. 3, p. 139.

V The Geschlecht of the Poem

¹ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht: Eine Erörterung von Georg Trakls Gedicht" in Unterwegs zur Sprache, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1985), GA 12, pp. 45-6. In translating "Geschlecht", Peter D. Hertz's English translation, "Language in the Poem", in On the Way to Language (New York: Harper & Row, 1971) offers at each turn, with inescapable arbitrariness, only one of its senses. Hertz translates the last instance of the word "Geschlecht" in the quoted passage as "sex". Certainly "sex" is one of the senses of "Geschlecht" and among those not yet listed the predominant, but is duality enough to identify "sex" and thus justify the translation? Heidegger's increasing linguistic purism after Being and Time denies him the Latinate "Sex" for denoting "sex" to the exclusion of all the other senses of "Geschlecht". Robert Minder, in "Heidegger und Hebel oder die Sprache von Messkirch" in >Hölderlin unter den Deutschen< und andere Aufsätze zur deutschen Literatur (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1968), pp. 86-153 discerns xenophobia in Heidegger's linguistic purism.

² That this twoness of the Geschlecht is to be interpreted as the difference between the human male and female of metaphysical biology is the extraordinarily reductive presupposition of David Farrell Krell's essay "Schlag der Liebe, Schlag des Todes. On a Theme in Heidegger and Trakl" in Radical Phenomenology: Essays in Honor of Martin Heidegger, ed. John Sallis (Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1978), pp. 238-58. Heidegger's text leaves open the question whether twoness determines the "Geschlecht" as "sex" or submits this signification itself to another folding.

³ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", p. 46.

⁴ Martin Heidegger and Elisabeth Blochmann, Briefwechsel 1918 — 1969, ed. Joachim W. Storck (Marbach am Neckar: Deutsche Schillergesellschaft, 1989), p. 91.

⁵ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", p. 46.

⁶ Ibid., p. 41.

⁷ Ibid.

⁸ Ibid., p. 42.

⁹ Ibid.

¹⁰ See the central discussion in §§47-9 in Being and Time.

¹¹ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", pp. 48-9.

¹² Cf. Jean-Daniel Krebs, "Georg Trakl: les poèmes du non-retour" in Germanica 1 (1987), pp. 32-48.

Krebs brings out a motif of homecoming to the grave in Trakl's poetry. But it must further be asked whether death in Trakl instantiates a notion of stasis or whether pilgrimage arrives at the accelerated decomposition of death as the homeland of non-positive humanity.

¹³ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", p. 49.

¹⁴ Walter Falk's essay, "Heidegger und Trakl" in Literaturwissenschaftliches Jahrbuch 4 (1963), endeavours to curtail the effects of decomposition, and hence its "critique" of metaphysics, by employing the figure of the sister in Trakl's poetry to ground an ethics. See p. 203: "For him the wish to stand by the beloved Thou in her torment and to liberate her from it became the more essential concern." A substantiality is here being imputed to the figure of the sister in disregard for the mutations this figure itself undergoes in Trakl's work.

¹⁵ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", p. 70.

¹⁶ Ibid., p. 73.

¹⁷ Egon Vietta, in "Georg Trakl in Heideggers Sicht", Die Pforte 5 (1953), dismisses any reading of "the beyond" in Trakl in terms of Christian eschatology. See p. 355: "The beyond of this poem becomes all the more unheimlich, particularly since everywhere it is evident that it is the poem of a journey: a journey — to the Occident." Trakl, as the poet of the West, is also the poet of the irredeemable, of the decadent. Precisely this opposition to Christianity Diana Orendi Hinze overlooks in Heidegger's text when she writes in "Heidegger und Trakl: Aus dem unveröffentlichten Briefwechsel Martin Heidegger — Ludwig Ficker", Orbis litterarum 32 (1977), p. 251: "The post-war generation's emotionally influenced identification with Trakl's melancholy poems was, to be sure, accommodated by Heidegger's definitions, yet his all too conciliatory perspective disregards all elements of the sickly and the ugly, the paranoid anxiety and the narcotic decrepitude, which are important components of the overall picture." It is doubtful that Heidegger's preference for other components can be ascribed to a conciliatory perspective, given that he situates the reconciliation of the Geschlecht in its difference.

¹⁸ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", p. 37.

¹⁹ Cf. Peter Schünemann, Georg Trakl (Munich: C. H. Beck, 1988), p. 53: "Behind the experience of Christ on Golgotha, frequently presented in the lyrics of Trakl's final years, there appears a primordial image in which the fear of being abandoned by God is extinguished — the deeper fear alone remains: the soul, it too, is in the end mortal."

²⁰ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", p. 76.

²¹ Thomas Bernhard, Old Masters, trans. Ewald Osers (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992), pp. 41-8. The passage, notwithstanding, is hilarious.

²² Heidegger, Beiträge zur Philosophie: Vom Ereignis, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (Frankfurt am Main: Klostermann, 1989), p. 317.

²³ Heidegger, The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics, trans. William McNeill and Nicholas Walker (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995), pp. 205-6.

²⁴ Ibid., p. 211.

²⁵ Ibid., p. 186.

²⁶ Ibid., p. 239.

²⁷ Ibid., p. 198.

²⁸ Ibid., p. 242.

²⁹ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 90.

³⁰ Heidegger, What Is Called Thinking?, p. 16.

³¹ Derrida, "Geschlecht II: Heidegger's Hand" in Deconstruction and Philosophy, ed. John Sallis (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), pp. 173-4.

³² Heidegger, "Letter on 'Humanism'" in Pathmarks, p. 248.

- ³³ Cf. Heidegger, Die Grundbegriffe der antiken Philosophie, ed. Franz-Karl Blust, (1993) GA 22, p. 311, where he discusses Aristotle's tract De anima and the human being's imputedly exclusive perception of time on the basis of a supposed ability to resist its instincts.
- ³⁴ Heidegger, What Is Called Thinking?, p. 6.
- ³⁵ Heidegger, "The Way to Language", trans. David Farrell Krell in Basic Writings, p. 397.
- ³⁶ Heidegger, The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics, p. 307.
- ³⁷ Ibid., p. 308.
- ³⁸ Heidegger, Logik als die Frage nach dem Wesen der Sprache, p. 169.
- ³⁹ Cf. Heidegger's own emphatic correction of readings of Being and Time in The Metaphysical Foundations of Logic, trans. Michael Heim (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984), p. 168: "Transcendence, being-in-the-world, is never to be equated and identified with intentionality." Transcendence is to be understood, Heidegger stresses, as the transcendence towards Being of beings.
- ⁴⁰ Heidegger, "The Onto-Theo-Logical Constitution of Metaphysics" in Identity and Difference, trans. Joan Stambaugh (New York: Harper & Row, 1969), p. 62.
- ⁴¹ Heidegger, "Die Sprache", in Unterwegs zur Sprache, p. 23.
- ⁴² Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", p. 74.
- ⁴³ Ibid., pp. 74-5.
- ⁴⁴ Heidegger, "Language" in Poetry, Language, Thought, trans. Albert Hofstadter (New York: Harper & Row, 1971), p. 208.
- ⁴⁵ Ibid., p. 33.
- ⁴⁶ Ibid., p. 33.
- ⁴⁷ Heidegger, "Recollection in Metaphysics", included in The End of Philosophy, trans. Joan Stambaugh (New York: Harper and Row, 1973), pp. 77-8.
- ⁴⁸ In other words, it is to accompany Trakl on the path of dissolution as the path specific to the poems. On the basis of this apparent indifference to the extant entities of the poems themselves, Heidegger's commentary has been accused of an insensitivity to Trakl's despair. See, for instance, Karsten Harries, "Language and Silence: Heidegger's Dialogue with Georg Trakl" in Martin Heidegger and the Question of Literature, ed. William V. Spanos (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1979), p. 169: "Heidegger does not hear this despair, perhaps because he is too ready to listen beyond the poet's words to his unspoken meaning." Harries takes it for granted that Trakl's unspoken meaning is less desperate than despair in its conventional sense.
- ⁴⁹ An early example is W. H. Rey, "Heidegger – Trakl: Einstimmiges Zwiegespräch" in Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 34 (1956), pp. 89–136.
- ⁵⁰ Modesto Carone Netto, Metáfora e Montagem (São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1974), pp. 154-5.
- ⁵¹ Alfred Doppler, "Bemerkungen zur poetischen Verfahrensweise Georg Trakls" in Sprache und Bekenntnis, ed. Wolfgang Frühwald and Günter Niggel (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1971), p. 355.
- ⁵² Rudolf D. Schier, "'Afra': Towards an Interpretation of Trakl" in The Germanic Review 41 (1966), p. 270n.
- ⁵³ Cf. Iris Denneler, "Poetische Spurensicherung. Erkundungen zu Georg Trakls 'Untergang'" in Sprache im technischen Zeitalter 89 (1984), pp. 71-79. Denneler totally trivialises this impersonality of Trakl's by interpreting it as a means of avoiding a direct confrontation with the taboo of incest.
- ⁵⁴ Richard Detsch, "Unity and Androgyny in Trakl's Works and the Writings of Other Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Century Authors" in The Dark Flutes of fall: Critical Essays on Georg Trakl, ed. Eric Williams (Columbia: Camden House, 1991), p. 115.
- ⁵⁵ Ursula Heckmann, Das verfluchte Geschlecht: Motive der Philosophie Otto Weiningers im Werk Georg Trakls (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1992), p. 206.
- ⁵⁶ Derrida, Of Spirit, p. 86.
- ⁵⁷ Heidegger, "Die Sprache im Gedicht", p. 51.
- ⁵⁸ Ibid., p. 45.
- ⁵⁹ Heidegger, Letter of 9/5/72 to Palmier, translated as a frontispiece in Jean-Michel Palmier, Situation de Georg Trakl (Paris: Pierre Belfond, 1987), p. 10.
- ⁶⁰ Heidegger, Being and Time, p. 220.

⁶¹ Cf. the definition of “communism” in terms of Mitsein and the consequent reassessment of the “betrayal” of the various communist regimes proposed in Jean-Luc Nancy, The Inoperative Community, ed. Peter Connor (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991), pp. 1-15.

⁶² Derrida, “Heidegger’s Ear: Philopolemology”, trans. John P. Leavey, Jr in Reading Heidegger. Commemorations, ed. John Sallis (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993), p. 176.

⁶³ Heidegger, Hölderlin’s Hymns »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, pp. 227-8.

⁶⁴ Heidegger, “Die Sprache im Gedicht”, p. 70.

⁶⁵ See letter of 24/4/12 to Erhard Buschbeck. Georg Trakl, Nachlass und Biographie, ed. Wolfgang Schneditz (Salzburg: Otto Müller, 1949), p. 28.

Bibliography

A. Works by Heidegger

In German

Gesamtausgabe (Frankfurt am Main: Klostermann, 1975-).

“Vorwort zur ersten Ausgabe der Frühen Schriften (1972)” in Frühe Schriften, ed.

Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1978), GA 1, pp. 55-7.

Die Kategorien- und Bedeutungslehre des Duns Scotus in Frühe Schriften, GA 1, pp. 189-412.

Sein und Zeit, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1977), GA 2.

“Der Ursprung des Kunstwerkes” in Holzwege, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1977), GA 5, pp. 1-74.

“Die Sprache im Gedicht: Eine Erörterung von Georg Trakls Gedicht” in Unterwegs zur Sprache, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1985), GA 12, pp. 31-78.

“Wege zur Aussprache” in Aus der Erfahrung des Denkens, ed. Hermann Heidegger (1983), GA 13, pp. 15-21.

“Sprache und Heimat” in Aus der Erfahrung des Denkens, GA 13, pp. 155-80.

“Telegramm an den Reichskanzler” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, ed. Hermann Heidegger (2000), GA 16, p. 105.

“Zum Semesterbeginn (3. November 1933)” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, GA 16, p. 184-5.

“Ansprache am 11. November in Leipzig” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, GA 16, p. 190-3.

“Die deutsche Universität” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, GA 16, pp. 285-307.

“Die gegenwärtige Lage und die künftige Aufgabe der deutschen Philosophie” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, GA 16, pp. 316-34.

“Erläuterungen und Grundsätzliches” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, GA 16, pp. 409-15.

“Nur ein Gott kann uns noch retten” in Reden und andere Zeugnisse eines Lebensweges, GA 16, pp. 652-83.

Die Grundbegriffe der antiken Philosophie, ed. Franz-Karl Blust, (1993) GA 22.

Einleitung in die Philosophie, eds. Otto Saame and Ina Saame-Speidel (1996), GA 27.

Vom Wesen der Wahrheit: Zu Platons Höhlengleichnis und Theätet, ed. Hermann Mörchen (1988), GA 34.

Logik als die Frage nach dem Wesen der Sprache, ed. Günter Seubold (1998), GA 38.

Hölderlins Hymnen »Germanien« und »Der Rhein«, ed. Susanne Ziegler (1980), GA 39.

Schelling: Vom Wesen der menschlichen Freiheit (1809), ed. Ingrid Schüßler (1988), GA 42.

Grundfragen der Philosophie, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1984), GA 45.

Nietzsche: Europäischer Nihilismus, ed. Petra Jaeger (1986), GA 48.

Die Metaphysik des deutschen Idealismus, ed. Günter Seubold (1991), GA 49.

1. Nietzsches Metaphysik 2. Einleitung in die Philosophie: Dichten und Denken, ed. Petra Jaeger (1990), GA 50.

Hölderlins Hymne »Andenken«, ed. Curd Ochwadt (1982), GA 52.

“Der Anfang des abendländischen Denkens. Heraklit” in Heraklit, ed. Manfred S. Frings (1979), GA 55, pp. 1-181.

“Die Idee der Philosophie und das Weltanschauungsproblem” in Zur Bestimmung der Philosophie, ed. Bernd Heimbüchel (1987), GA 56/57, pp. 1-117.

Beiträge zur Philosophie: Vom Ereignis, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1989), GA 65.

Besinnung, ed. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (1997), GA 66.

Metaphysik und Nihilismus, ed. Hans-Joachim Friedrich (1999), GA 67.

“Die Negativität. Eine Auseinandersetzung mit Hegel aus dem Ansatz in der Negativität (1938/39, 1941)” in Hegel, ed. Ingrid Schüßler (1993), GA 68, pp. 1-61.

“Das abendländische Gespräch” in Zu Hölderlin. Griechenlandreisen, ed. Curd Ochwadt (2000), GA 75, pp. 57-196.

“Abendgespräch in einem Kriegsgefangenenlager in Rußland zwischen einem Jüngeren und einem Älteren” in Feldweg-Gespräche (1944/45), ed. Ingrid Schüßler (1995), GA 77, pp. 203-45.

Heidegger, Martin and Elisabeth Blochmann, Briefwechsel 1918 — 1969, ed. Joachim W. Storck (Marbach am Neckar: Deutsche Schillergesellschaft, 1989).

Heidegger, Martin and Karl Jaspers, Briefwechsel 1920-63, ed. Walter Biemel and Hans Saner (Frankfurt am Main, Munich and Zürich: Vittorio Klostermann and Piper, 1990).

Heidegger, Martin and Erhart Kästner, Briefwechsel, ed. Heinrich W. Petzet (Frankfurt am Main: Insel, 1986).

In Translation

An Introduction to Metaphysics, trans. Ralph Manheim (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1959).

Basic Concepts, trans. Gary E. Aylesworth (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993).

Being and Time, trans. John Macquarrie and Edward Robinson (San Francisco: Harper, 1962).

Contributions to Philosophy, trans. Parvis Emad and Kenneth Maly (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999).

Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit, trans. Parvis Emad and Kenneth Maly (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994).

History of the Concept of Time, trans. Theodore Kisiel (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985).

Hölderlin's Hymn "The Ister", trans. William McNeill and Julia Davis (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996).

Nietzsche, trans. David Farrell Krell (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1979), vol. 1.

-
- Nietzsche*, trans. Frank A. Capuzzi, Joan Stambaugh and David Farrell Krell (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), vol. 3.
- Parmenides*, trans. André Schuwer and Richard Rojcewicz (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992).
- Plato's Sophist*, trans. Richard Rojcewicz and André Schuwer (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997).
- The Basic Problems of Phenomenology*, trans. Albert Hofstadter (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982).
- The Concept of Time*, trans. William McNeill (Oxford: Blackwell, 1992).
- The Fundamental Concepts of Metaphysics*, trans. William McNeill and Nicholas Walker (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995).
- The Metaphysical Foundations of Logic*, trans. Michael Heim (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984).
- The Principle of Reason*, trans. Reginald Lilly (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991).
- What Is Called Thinking?*, trans. J. Glenn Gray (New York: Harper & Row, 1968).
- What is Philosophy?*, trans. William Kluback and Jean T. Wilde (London: Vision Press, 1956).
- What is a Thing?*, trans. W. B. Barton, Jr. and Vera Deutsch (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1967).
- "The Self-Assertion of the German University", trans. William S. Lewis in The Heidegger Controversy: A Critical Reader, ed. Richard Wolin (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1993), pp. 29-39.
- "The Call to the Labor Service", trans. William S. Lewis in The Heidegger Controversy, p. 53-5.
- "Letter to the Rector of Freiburg University, November 4, 1945", trans. Richard Wolin in The Heidegger Controversy, pp. 61-6.
- "Overcoming Metaphysics", trans. Joan Stambaugh, in The Heidegger Controversy, pp. 67-90.

-
- “‘Only a God Can Save Us’: Der Spiegel’s Interview with Martin Heidegger (1966)”, trans. Maria D. Alter and John P. Caputo in The Heidegger Controversy, pp. 91-116.
- “Letter from Heidegger to Marcuse of January 20, 1948”, trans. Richard Wolin in The Heidegger Controversy, pp. 162-3.
- “The Rectorate 1933/34: Facts and Thoughts” in Martin Heidegger and National Socialism: Questions and Answers, eds. Günther Neske and Emil Kettering, trans. Lisa Harries (New York: Paragon House, 1990), pp.15-32.
- “The Origin of the Work of Art”, trans. Albert Hofstadter in Basic Writings, ed. David Farrell Krell (San Francisco: Harper, 1993), pp. 143-212.
- “The Way to Language”, trans. David Farrell Krell in Basic Writings, pp. 397-426.
- “On the Essence of Truth”, trans. John Sallis in Pathmarks, ed. William McNeill (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), pp. 136-154.
- “Plato’s Doctrine of Truth”, trans. Thomas Sheehan in Pathmarks, pp. 155-182.
- “Letter on ‘Humanism’”, trans. Frank A. Capuzzi in Pathmarks, pp. 239-276.
- “On the Question of Being”, trans. William McNeill in Pathmarks, pp. 291-322.
- “Language in the Poem” in On the Way to Language, trans. Peter D. Hertz (New York: Harper & Row, 1971), pp. 159-98.
- “Language” in Poetry, Language, Thought, trans. Albert Hofstadter (New York: Harper & Row, 1971), pp. 187-210.
- “The Onto-Theo-Logical Constitution of Metaphysics” in Identity and Difference, trans. Joan Stambaugh (New York: Harper & Row, 1969), pp. 42-76.
- “Recollection in Metaphysics”, in The End of Philosophy, trans. Joan Stambaugh (New York: Harper and Row, 1973), pp. 75-83.
- Letter of 9/5/72 to Jean-Michel Palmier, trans. Jean-Michel Palmier in Jean-Michel Palmier, Situation de Georg Trakl (Paris: Pierre Belfond, 1987), pp. 9-10.

B. Secondary Works

-
- Adorno, T., "Parataxis" in Notes to Literature, trans. Shierry Weber Nicholsen (New York: Columbia University Press, 1992), p. 109-49.
- Althusser, L., For Marx, trans. Ben Brewster (London: Penguin, 1969).
- Arendt, H., The Human Condition. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1958).
- Aristotle, Metaphysica in The Works of Aristotle, trans. W. D. Ross (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1908-52), vol. 8.
- , Politics, trans. H. Rackham (London: William Heinemann, 1932).
- Aron, J.-P., Les modernes (Paris: Gallimard, 1984).
- Axelos, K., Einführung in ein künftiges Denken: Über Marx und Heidegger (Tübingen: Max Niemeyer, 1966).
- Bailiff, J., "Truth and Power: Martin Heidegger, 'The Essence of Truth' and 'The Self-Assertion of the German University'" in Man and World 20 (1987), pp. 327-36.
- Barnard, F. M., Herder's Social and Political Thought: From Enlightenment to Nationalism (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1965).
- Bartky, S. L., "Heidegger's Philosophy of Art" in Heidegger: The Man and the Thinker, ed. Thomas Sheehan (Chicago: Precedent, 1981), pp. 257-274.
- Beaufret, J., De l'existentialisme à Heidegger (Paris: J. Vrin, 1986).
- Benjamin, W., "Two Poems by Friedrich Hölderlin" in Selected Writings, eds. Marcus Bullock and Michael W. Jennings (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1996), vol. 1, pp. 18-36.
- Bernhard, T., Old Masters, trans. Ewald Osers (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992).
- Bieberbach, L., Die völkische Verwurzelung der Wissenschaft (Typen mathematischen Schaffens) (Heidelberg: Kommissionsverlag der Weiß'schen Universitätsbuchhandlung, 1940).
- Binder, W., "Sinn und Gestalt der Heimat in Hölderlins Dichtung" in Hölderlin-Jahrbuch 8 (1954), pp. 46-78.
- Boehm, G., "Im Horizont der Zeit. Heideggers Werkbegriff und die Kunst der Moderne" in Kunst und Technik: Gedächtnisschrift zum 100. Geburtstag von Martin

-
- Heidegger, eds. Walter Biemel and Friedrich-Wilhelm von Herrmann (Frankfurt am Main: Klostermann, 1989), pp. 255-85.
- Bourdieu, P., The Political Ontology of Martin Heidegger, trans. Peter Collier (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1991).
- Bullock, A., Hitler: A Study in Tyranny (London: Odhams Press, 1952).
- Caputo, J. D., "People of God, people of being: the theological presuppositions of Heidegger's path of thought" in Appropriating Heidegger, ed. James E. Faulconer and Mark A. Wrathall (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000), pp. 85-100.
- Carone Netto, M., Metáfora e Montagem (São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1974).
- Cassirer, E., The Myth of the State (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1974).
- Clastres, P., Society against the State, trans. Robert Hurley (New York: Urizen, 1977).
- Deleuze, G., Cinema 2: The Time-Image, trans. Hugh Tomlinson and Robert Galeta (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1989).
- Deleuze, G. and F. Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus, trans. Brian Massumi (London: Athlone, 1988).
- , Kafka: Toward a Minor Literature, trans. Dana Polan (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1986).
- , What is Philosophy?, trans. Hugh Tomlinson and Graham Burchill (London: Verso, 1994).
- Denneler, I., "Poetische Spurensicherung. Erkundungen zu Georg Trakls 'Untergang'" in Sprache im technischen Zeitalter 89 (1984), pp. 71-9.
- Derrida, J., Of Spirit, trans. Geoffrey Bennington and Rachel Bowlby (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989).
- , The Truth in Painting, trans. Geoff Bennington and Ian McLeod (Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1987).
- , "Violence and Metaphysics: An Essay on the Thought of Emmanuel Lévinas" in Writing and Difference, trans. Alan Bass (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978), pp. 79-153.

-
- , “Heidegger’s Ear: Philopolemology”, trans. John P. Leavey, Jr in Reading Heidegger: Commemorations, ed. John Sallis (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993), pp. 165-218.
- , “Geschlecht II: Heidegger’s Hand” in Deconstruction and Philosophy, ed. John Sallis (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), pp. 161-96.
- Detsch, R., “Unity and Androgyny in Trakl’s Works and the Writings of Other Late Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Century Authors” in The Dark Flutes of fall: Critical Essays on Georg Trakl, ed. Eric Williams (Columbia: Camden House, 1991), pp. 115-33.
- Doppler, A., “Bemerkungen zur poetischen Verfahrensweise Georg Trakls” in Sprache und Bekenntnis, ed. Wolfgang Frühwald and Günter Niggel (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1971), pp. 349-359.
- Dostal, R. J., “Beyond being: Heidegger’s Plato” in Martin Heidegger: Critical Assessments, ed. Christopher Macann (London: Routledge, 1992), vol. 2, pp. 61 – 89.
- , “The Public and the People: Heidegger’s Illiberal Politics” in The Review of Metaphysics 47 (March 1994), pp. 517-55.
- Dreyfus, H. L., Being-in-the-world (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1991).
- , “Heidegger on the connection between nihilism, art, technology, and politics” in The Cambridge Companion to Heidegger, ed. Charles Guignon (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993), pp. 289-316.
- Falk, W., “Heidegger und Trakl” in Literaturwissenschaftliches Jahrbuch 4 (1963), pp. 191-204.
- Fariás, V., Heidegger and Nazism, trans. Paul Burrell and Gabriel R. Ricci (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989).
- Faye, J.-P., Langages totalitaires (Paris: Hermann, 1972).
- Fichte, J. G., Addresses to the German Nation, trans. R. F. Jones and G. H. Turnbull (New York: Harper Torchbook, 1968).
- Fischer-Barnicol, H. A., “Spiegelungen — Vermittlungen” in Erinnerung an Martin Heidegger, ed. Günther Neske (Pfullingen: Neske, 1977), pp. 87-103.

-
- Foucault, M., "A Preface to Transgression" in Language, Counter-Memory, Practice, trans. Donald F. Bouchard and Sherry Simon (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1977), pp. 29-52.
- Freud, S., "The 'Uncanny'" in The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, ed. James Strachey (London: The Hogarth Press, 1953-75), vol. 17, pp. 219-56.
- Fritzsche, J., Historical Destiny and National Socialism in Heidegger's "Being and Time" (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1999).
- Fynsk, C., "But Suppose We Were to Take the Rectorial Address Seriously... Gérard Granel's De l'université" in Graduate Faculty Philosophy Journal 14/15 (1991), pp. 335-62.
- Gaier, U., "Hölderlin's vaterländische Sangart" in Hölderlin-Jahrbuch 25 (1986-1987), pp. 12-59.
- Gasman, D., The Scientific Origins of National Socialism: Social Darwinism in Ernst Haeckel and the German Monist League (London: Macdonald & Co., 1971).
- Gethmann-Siefert, A., "Heidegger and Hölderlin: the over-usage of 'Poets in an impoverished time'", trans. Richard Taft in Martin Heidegger: Critical Assessments, ed. Christopher Macann (London: Routledge, 1992), vol. 3, pp. 247-76.
- Goebbels, J., Goebbels spricht : Reden aus Kampf und Sieg (Oldenburg: Gerhard Stalling, 1933).
- Goldmann, L., Lukács and Heidegger: Towards a New Philosophy, trans. William Q. Boelhower (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1977).
- Grieder, A., "What did Heidegger mean by 'Essence'?", in Martin Heidegger: Critical Assessments, ed. Christopher Macann (London: Routledge, 1992), vol. 1, pp. 183-212.
- Habermas, J., The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity, trans. Frederick Lawrence (Cambridge: Polity, 1987).
- , "Work and Weltanschauung: The Heidegger Controversy from a German Perspective", trans. John McCumber in Critical Inquiry 15 (1989), pp. 431-56.

-
- Harries, K., "Language and Silence: Heidegger's Dialogue with Georg Trakl" in Martin Heidegger and the Question of Literature, ed. William V. Spanos (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1979), pp. 155-71.
- Heckmann, U., Das verfluchte Geschlecht: Motive der Philosophie Otto Weiningers im Werk Georg Trakls (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1992).
- Hegel, G. W. F., Aesthetics, trans. T. M. Knox (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975).
- , Early Theological Writings, trans. T. M. Knox (Gloucester: Peter Smith, 1970).
- , Phenomenology of Spirit, trans. A. V. Miller (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977).
- , Philosophy of Nature: Being Part Two of the Encyclopaedia of the Philosophical Sciences, trans. A. V. Miller (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1970).
- , Philosophy of Right, trans. T. M. Knox (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1952).
- , System of Ethical Life and First Philosophy of Spirit, trans. H. S. Harris and T. M. Knox (Albany: SUNY Press, 1979).
- , "The English Reform Bill" in Political Writings, trans. T. M. Knox (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1964), pp. 295-330.
- , The History of Philosophy, trans. E. S. Haldane and Frances H. Simson (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1955).
- , The Philosophy of History, trans. J. Sibree (New York: Dover, 1956).
- , "Rede zum Antritt des philosophischen Lehramtes an der Universität Berlin" in Vorlesungsmanuskripte II (1816-1831) in Gesammelte Werke (Hamburg: Felix Meiner, 1995), vol. 18, pp. 11-31.
- Herf, J., Reactionary modernism: Technology, culture, and politics in Weimar and the Third Reich (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984).
- Hitler, A., Mein Kampf, trans. Ralph Manheim (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1943).
- , »Es spricht der Führer«: 7 exemplarische Hitler-Reden, eds. Hildegard von Kotze and Helmut Krausnick (Gütersloh: Signert Mohn, 1966).
- Hobbes, T., De Cive, ed. Howard Warrender (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983).
- , Leviathan, ed. Richard Tuck (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991).

-
- Hoberg, C. A., Das Dasein des Menschen: Die Grundfrage der Heideggerschen Philosophie (Zeulenroda: Bernhard Sporn, 1937).
- Hölderlin, F., Sämtliche Werke, ed. Friedrich Beissner (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1946-).
- , Essays and Letters on Theory, trans. Thomas Pfau (Albany: SUNY Press, 1988).
- , Hyperion, or The Hermit in Greece, trans. Willard R. Trask in “Hyperion” and Selected Poems, ed. Eric L. Santner (New York: Continuum, 1990).
- , Poems and Fragments, trans. Michael Hamburger (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1966).
- Horkheimer, M. and T. W. Adorno, Dialectics of Enlightenment, trans. John Cumming (London: Verso, 1979).
- Ijsseling, S., “Mimesis and Translation” in Reading Heidegger: Commemorations, ed. John Sallis (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993), pp. 348-51.
- Irigaray, L., The forgetting of air in Martin Heidegger, trans. Mary Beth Mader (London: Athlone Press, 1999).
- Jaensch, E., Die Wissenschaft und die deutsche völkische Bewegung (Marburg: N. G. Ewert, 1933).
- Jaspers, K., Notizen zu Martin Heidegger, ed. Hans Saner (Munich: R. Piper, 1978).
- Kant, I., Critique of Pure Reason, trans. Norman Kemp Smith (London: Macmillan, 1933).
- , Logic, trans. Robert S. Hartman and Wolfgang Schwarz (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1974).
- , Perpetual Peace (New York: Columbia University Press, 1939).
- , “What is Orientation in Thinking?” in Political Writings, trans. H. B. Nisbet (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991), pp. 237-49.
- , The Critique of Judgement, trans. James Creed Meredith (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1952).
- Kettering, E., Nähe: Das Denken Martin Heideggers (Pfullingen: Neske, 1987).

-
- Kierkegaard, S., Concluding Unscientific Postscript to Philosophical Fragments, trans. Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992).
- Kommerell, M., Der Dichter als Führer in der deutschen Klassik (Frankfurt am Main: Vittorio Klostermann, 1942).
- Krebs, J.-D., "Georg Trakl: les poèmes du non-retour" in Germanica 1 (1987), pp. 35-48.
- Krell, D. F., Daimon Life: Heidegger and life-philosophy (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, c1992).
- , "Schlag der Liebe, Schlag des Todes. On a Theme in Heidegger and Trakl" in Radical Phenomenology: Essays in Honor of Martin Heidegger, ed. John Sallis (Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1978), pp. 238-258.
- Kriek, E., Die Erneuerung der Universität (Frankfurt am Main: H. Bechhold, 1933).
- , "Germanischer Mythos und Heideggersche Philosophie" in Volk im Werden (1934) included in Nachlese zu Heidegger, Guido Schneeberger, ed. (Bern: 1962), pp. 225-8.
- Lacoue-Labarthe, P., Heidegger, Art and Politics, trans. Chris Turner (London: Basil Blackwell, 1990).
- , "The Caesura of the Speculative" in Typography: Mimesis, Philosophy, Politics, ed. Christopher Fynsk (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989), pp. 208-35.
- , "Transcendence Ends in Politics" in Typography: Mimesis, Philosophy, Politics, ed. Christopher Fynsk (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989), pp. 267-300.
- Lévinas, E., "Reflections on the Philosophy of Hitlerism", trans. Séan Hand in Critical Inquiry 17 (Autumn 1990), pp. 62-71.
- Löwith, K., Mein Leben in Deutschland vor und nach 1933, excerpt translated as "My Last Meeting with Heidegger in Rome, 1936" by Richard Wolin in The Heidegger Controversy, ed. Richard Wolin (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1993), pp. 140-3.
- Lukács, G., History and Class Consciousness, trans. Rodney Livingstone (London: Merlin Press, 1971).
- , Die Zerstörung der Vernunft (Neuwied am Rhein: Luchterhand, 1962).

-
- Lyotard, J.-F., Heidegger and "the jews", trans. Andreas Michel and Mark S. Roberts (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1990).
- McNeill, W., "Heimat: Heidegger on the Threshold" in Heidegger toward the Turn: Essays on the Work of the 1930s, ed. James Risser (Albany: SUNY Press, 1999), pp. 319-49.
- Marten, R., "Ein rassistisches Konzept von Humanität" in Badische Zeitung, 19-20.12.1987, p. 14.
- Marx, K., Critique of Hegel's 'Philosophy of Right', trans. Annette Jolin and Joseph O'Malley (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970).
- , Early Texts, trans. David McLellan (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1971).
- Marx, K. and F. Engels, The German Ideology, trans. S. Ryazanskaya (London: Lawrence & Wishart, 1965).
- Marx, W., "Thinking and Its Matter" in Heidegger Memorial Lectures, ed. Werner Marx, trans. Steven W. Davis (Pittsburgh: Duquesne University, 1982), pp. 23-54.
- Michel, W., Hölderlins Abendländische Wendung (Weimar: Feuer, 1922).
- Minder, R., "Heidegger und Hebel oder die Sprache von Messkirch" in >Hölderlin unter den Deutschen< und andere Aufsätze zur deutschen Literatur (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1968), pp. 86-153.
- Montaigne, M., "That to study philosophy, is to learn to die" in The Essays of Michael, Seigneur de Montaigne, trans. Charles Cotton (London: Ward, Lock, and Tyler, no year given), pp. 63-78.
- Nancy, J.-L., The Birth to Presence, trans. Brian Holmes and others (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1993).
- , The Inoperative Community, ed. Peter Connor (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991).
- Nietzsche, F., "Antwort", in Werke: Kritische Ausgabe, ed. Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1967-), vol. 7, 3, p. 38.
- , Beyond Good and Evil, trans. R. J. Hollingdale (Penguin: Harmondsworth, 1990).

-
- , The Will to Power, trans. Walter Kaufmann and R. J. Hollingdale (New York: Vintage Books, 1968).
- Oldemeyer, E., “Eher auf Husserl als auf Lukács zielend” in Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 3/3/1988, p. 9.
- Orendi Hinze, D., “Heidegger und Trakl: Aus dem unveröffentlichten Briefwechsel Martin Heidegger — Ludwig Ficker”, Orbis litterarum 32 (1977), pp. 247-53.
- Ortega y Gasset, J., The Revolt of the Masses (London : Unwin, 1961).
- Petzet, H. W., Encounters and Dialogues with Martin Heidegger: 1929-1976, trans. Parvis Emad and Kenneth Maly (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993).
- Plato, The Republic in The Dialogues of Plato, trans. B. Jowett (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1953), vol. 2, pp. 163- 499.
- , The Symposium, trans. W. Hamilton (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1951).
- Pöggeler, O., Die Frage nach der Kunst: Von Hegel zu Heidegger (Freibürg/München: Alber, 1984).
- Polt, R., “Metaphysical Liberalism in Heidegger’s Beiträge zur Philosophie” in Political Theory 25 (October 1997), pp. 655-79.
- Rauschning, H., Germany’s Revolution of Destruction, trans. E. W. Dickes (London: William Heinemann, 1939).
- Renan, E., Qu’est-ce qu’une Nation? (Paris: Imprimerie nationale, 1996).
- Rey, W. H., “Heidegger – Trakl: Einstimmiges Zwiegespräch” in Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 34 (1956), pp. 89–136.
- Rosenberg, A., Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts (München: Hoheneichen, 1934).
- Rosenzweig, F., The Star of Redemption, trans. William W. Hallo (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971).
- Sallis, J., Echoes: After Heidegger (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990).
- Schier, R. D., “‘Afra’: Towards an Interpretation of Trakl” in The Germanic Review 41 (1966), p. 264-78.
- Schmitt, C., Staat, Bewegung, Volk (Hamburg: Hanseatische Verlagsanstalt, 1933).

-
- Schramm, W. von, "Schöpferische Kritik des Krieges" in Krieg und Krieger, ed. Ernst Jünger (Berlin: Junker und Dünhaupt, 1930), pp. 31-49.
- Schünemann, P., Georg Trakl (Munich: C. H. Beck, 1988).
- Schürmann, R., Heidegger on Being and Acting: From Principles to Anarchy, trans. Christine-Marie Gros (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990).
- Schwan, A., "Heideggers „Beiträge zur Philosophie“ und die Politik" in Martin Heidegger: Kunst-Politik-Technik, eds. Christoph Jamme and Karsten Harries (Munich: Wilhelm Fink, 1992), pp. 175-202.
- Shestov, L., Athens and Jerusalem, trans. Bernard Martin (Athens: Ohio University Press, 1966).
- Sieg, U., "Die Verjudung des deutschen Geistes" in Die Zeit, Hamburg, 22 December 1989, p. 50.
- Sikka, S., "Heidegger's Concept of Volk" in The Philosophical Forum 26 (Winter 1994), pp. 101-26.
- Sluga, H., Heidegger's Crisis: Philosophy and Politics in Nazi Germany (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1993).
- Souche-Dagues, D., "The dialogue between Heidegger and Hegel" in Heidegger: Critical Assessments, ed. Christopher Macann (London: Routledge, 1992), vol. 2, pp. 246-76.
- Surber, J. P., "Heidegger's Critique of Hegel's Notion of Time" in Philosophy and Phenomenological Research 39 (1978-9), pp. 358-77.
- Szondi, P., Hölderlin-Studien. Mit einem Traktat über philologische Erkenntnis (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1970).
- Taminiaux, J., "Finitude and the Absolute: Remarks on Hegel and Heidegger" in Heidegger: The Man and the Thinker, ed. Thomas Sheehan (Chicago: Precedent, 1981), pp. 187-208.
- Thomä, D., Die Zeit des Selbst und die Zeit danach (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1990).

-
- Thomasberger, A., “‘Der Gesichtspunct aus dem wir das Altertum anzusehen haben’.
Grundlinien des Hölderlinschen Traditionsverständnisses.” Hölderlin Jahrbuch
24 (1984-85), pp. 189-94.
- Trakl, G., Gedichte (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1974).
- , Nachlass und Biographie, ed. Wolfgang Schneditz (Salzburg: Otto Müller, 1949).
- Unruh, F. F. von, Friedrich Hölderlin (Stuttgart: Georg Truckenmüller, 1942).
- Vietta, E., “Georg Trakl in Heideggers Sicht”, Die Pforte 5 (1953), pp. 351-355.
- Vietta, S., Heideggers Kritik am Nationalsozialismus und an der Technik (Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1989).
- Wolin, R., The Politics of Being: The Political Thought of Martin Heidegger (New York: Columbia University Press, 1990).
- Young, J., Heidegger Philosophy Nazism (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997).
- Zarader, M., La dette impensée: Heidegger et l’héritage hébraïque (Paris: Seuil, 1990).
- Ziegler, S., Heidegger, Hölderlin und die ἀληθεια: Martin Heideggers Geschichtsdenken in seinen Vorlesungen 1934/35 bis 1944 (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1991).
- Zimmerman, M. E., Heidegger’s Confrontation with Modernity: Technology, Politics and Art (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990).